

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Succession of Henry V.—Insurrection of the Lollards—Invasion of France—Battle of Azincourt—Second invasion of France—Conquest of Normandy—Murder of the duke of Burgundy—Henry is made Regent of France—Reduces Meaux—And dies—His funeral—Affairs of the Church.

THE late king had outlived his popularity, and the intelligence of his death excited little regret in any part of his dominions. His eldest son, Henry of Monmouth, immediately ascended the throne. He had so long been considered their apparent, that the claim of the earl of March was never mentioned; and though his errors had created a prejudice against him, his subjects were willing to attribute them rather to the giddiness of youth than to depravity of heart. Neither did he disappoint their expectations. As soon as his father expired he withdrew to his closet, spent the rest of the day in privacy and prayer, and in the evening hastened to his confessor, a recluse in the church of Westminster; by whom he was confirmed in his resolution to atone for the scandal of his past, by the propriety of his subsequent conduct. The dissolute companions of his pleasures were instantly dismissed: men of knowledge and experience were invited round the throne; and those, who by checking his excesses had earned the enmity of the prince, found themselves, to their surprise, honoured with the approbation and friendship of the king*. As an act of justice, he set at liberty the earl of March, who from his childhood had been kept in confinement by the late monarch, for no other crime than his right to the throne: after some time he restored the son of Hotspur, an exile in Scotland, to the honours and hereditary estates of the Percies; and when the remains of the unfortunate Richard were removed by his orders from Langley to Westminster abbey, he testified his respect for that prince by attending as chief mourner in the funeral procession†.

Henry had partaken of the general alarm excited among the higher classes by the levelling principles of the Lollards; and, when he was only prince of Wales, had joined the lords and commons in presenting a petition to his father for the arrest and punishment of their preachers‡. Now, however, the chiefs of the sect, whether they were urged forward by enthusiasm, or intoxicated with success, instead of labouring to remove Fabian, 57. No one can believe that Henry had he not been convinced that the Richard in Stirling castle was an impostor, would have acted in this manner. In any other supposition he would have been guilty, gratuitously and deliberately, of hypocrisy and sacrilege.

these unfavorable impressions, sought to intimidate their adversaries. During Henry's first parliament papers were affixed to the doors of churches in London, stating that, if force were employed to suppress the new doctrines, a hundred thousand men would be found ready to draw the sword in their defence*. It was a bold, and at that moment a most alarming announcement; for it was made at a time when the king, the nobility, and the capital of France were actually in the possession and at the mercy of a lawless and infatuated populace†. An inquiry was instituted, and with the aid of Burton, "the king's spy," the authors or abettors of these papers were traced to Cowling, the residence of sir John Oldcastle, who, having married the heiress of the last Lord Cobham, had been summoned to the house of lords in right of his wife. Hitherto he had made no great display of religious principle. During the last reign, among the wild and dissolute companions of the prince his pre-eminence in vice had been universally admitted; and so firmly established was his reputation in that respect, that for more than a century after his death sir John Oldcastle continued to tread the stage in the character which has since been transferred to the facetious knight sir John Falstaff‡. Now, however, he made himself the patron of the new teachers; and Cowling became their headquarters, whence they issued on their missions into the neighbourhood, setting at defiance the authority of the bishops and the officers of the ecclesiastical courts.

- mate with the sovereign *, instead of summoning him before them, denounced him to the king as the supporter of false doctrine. Henry undertook to convert his friend with all the zeal of an apostle ; but the disciple ventured to contradict his master, and suddenly withdrew from Windsor to Cowling. His departure was followed by a proclamation ordering the magistrates to apprehend all itinerant preachers, and by a direction to the archbishop to proceed against Oldcastle according to law. The spiritual powers of that prelate were soon exhausted : but the knight, aware of the necessity of satisfying the king, returned to Windsor with a new confession of faith, subscribed by himself. Henry refused to receive it ; confessions of faith were matters appertaining to the bishops, not to him †. Foiled in this instance, the knight offered to clear himself from the suspicion of heresy, upon oath with a hundred impurgators of the same rank, or to abide the decision of God by meeting in single combat any adversary, Christian or infidel, who dared to accept his challenge. But Henry coolly inquired if he would submit to the decision of the bishops, and on his reply that he appealed from their judgment to that of the pope, committed him to the Tower, that he might be

† This document still exists. It begins with the apostles' creed, and the doctrine of the trinity, and then declares that no man can be saved unless he be a member of the church. Now the church consists of three bodies, — 1, of the saints in heaven, who during life denounced Satan, the world, and the flesh ; 2, of the souls in purgatory, abiding the mercy of God, and a full deliverance of pain ; 3, and of the church militant, which church is subdivided into three estates : 1, of the priesthood, which ought to teach the Scripture purely, and give example of good living ; 2, of knighthood, which, having the sword, should compel the priesthood to fulfil its duty, and should seclude all false teachers ; and, 3, of the common people, who ought to bear true obedience to their kings, and civil governors, and priests. It moreover declares that the sacraments are necessary to all believers, and that in the sacrament of the altar is contained very Christ's body and blood. that was born of the Virgin and died on the cross. forthcoming on the day mentioned in the citation already received by him from the archbishop of Canterbury.

On his appearance in court, his demeanour was as arrogant and insulting as that of his judge was mild and dignified. Not content with signifying his dissent from the established creed, he poured out a torrent of abuse against all those by whom it was upheld. He maintained that the church had ceased to teach the doctrine of the gospel from the moment that it became infected with the poison of worldly riches; that the clergy were the antichrist; that the pope was the head, the bishops and prelates the limbs; and the religious orders the tail of the beast; and that the only true successor of St. Peter was he who most faithfully practised the virtues of St. Peter. Then turning to the spectators, and extending his arms, he exclaimed: "Beware of the men who sit here as my judges. They will seduce both you and themselves, and will lead you to hell." He was brought to the bar on two different days, and persisting in his opinions, was pronounced an obstinate heretic*. The primate, however, when he delivered him to the civil magistrate, procured from the king a respite of fifty days, during which Oldcastle found the means to escape from the Tower, and to assemble the most ardent of his partisans. Emissaries were immediately despatched into the neighbouring counties, the aid of the preachers was invoked, and crowds of fanatics held themselves in readiness to march to the metropolis. The first plan of the leaders was to surprise the king and his brothers during the Christmas festivities at Eltham. It failed, through the unexpected departure of the court to Westminster. These men resolved to make a demonstration of their strength by meeting in the fields at St. Giles's, on the morrow of the Epiphany. This Henry, with the example of Paris before his eyes, determined to prevent. Having secured the gates of the city, to separate the Lollards within the walls from those without, he proceeded, soon after midnight, with a strong force, to the place of rendezvous. The roads were covered with insurgents repairing from all quarters towards St. Giles's. The first comers, who, to the question, For whom are you? replied by the preconcerted watchword, "For sir John Oldcastle," were disarmed and secured. By degrees a few made their escape; they spread the alarm, and the parties on their march

1414. precipitately dispersed. Of the prisoners, about seventy
 Jan. were tried and condemned, at the sessions at West-11, minster; and one half of those paid the forfeit of their
 12. lives. Two of the leaders, sir John Oldcastle and sir Thomas Talbot, escaped; a third, sir Roger Acton, was
 Feb. taken, condemned, drawn, and hanged. His dead body
 12. was buried under the gallows*.

* The admirers of sir John Oldcastle are at a loss how to exculpate him and the Lollards on this occasion. The testimony of the old chroniclers (Tit. Liv. 6. Wals. 385, 6. Elm. 31, 32) is fully borne out by parliamentary documents, judicial records, and royal proclamations. — Rot. Parl. iv. 24. 108. Rym. ix. 89. 119. 129. 170. 193. Hence Fuller remarks in his usually quaint style, "Let Mr. Foxe be this Lord Cobham's compurgator. I dare not; and if my hand were on the book I would take it back again. Yet, 'so that as I will not acquit, I will not condemn him, but leave all to the revelation of the righteous judgment of God.'" — Church History, l. iv. p. 168. [It must not be understood that Fuller means to blame any of sir John Oldcastle's positions, except his political rebellion. Foxe is eager, in his very full and loving account of Oldcastle, to defend him in that matter, and attempts to disprove the most violent charges against him. It seems quite clear that Foxe must have had authorities for his account of Oldcastle's hearing before the bishops, besides the acts referred to in Dr. Lingard's note on p. 3. It can hardly be expected that a Roman Catholic should place much reliance on so violent a controversialist as Foxe, but surely, for the defence of an English heretic, the acts of the ecclesiastical body which sentenced him make testimony as partial on one side as his own admirers' reports on the other.]

It is to be observed that between sir John Oldcastle's escape, at this time, and his execution, Dec. 14, 1417, occurred the event, so important in the history of the Reformation, of Huss's execution, by order of the council of Constance, July 6, 1415.

It seems to me that nothing more than a reference to the prevailing theological fashions is needed to account for the singular change of sir John Old-

But what could be the object of these misguided men? It was to remodel the state according to the doctrines of their sect; to reform both the "priesthood and knight-hood," under the auspices of sir John Oldcastle. Hence the commons, in their address to the king, state, that the insurgents sought "to destroy the Christian faith, 'the king, the spiritual and temporal estates, and all 'manner of policy and law.'" Henry in his proclamation declares that they meant "to destroy him, his "brothers, and several of the spiritual and temporal "lords, to confiscate the possessions of the church, to "secularize the religious orders, to divide the realm into "confederate districts, and to appoint sir John Oldcastle "president of the commonwealth." The failure of the insurrection had the usual effect of adding to the severity of the penal laws already in existence. It was enacted that all judges and magistrates should be authorized to arrest persons suspected of lollardism, and deliver them over to the ecclesiastical castle into sir John Falstaff, on the stage, as alluded to by Dr. Lingard. Mr. Collier sums up the latest conclusions of the Shakespearian critics, after the publication of an interesting pamphlet, in which the controversy on the point has been discussed by Mr. Halliwell. Where Mr. Collier and Mr. Halliwell agree, we may suppose the truth is very nearly hit. Mr. Collier says:

"Mr. Halliwell, in his 'Essay on the Character of Sir John Falstaff,' goes "far to establish the three following propositions: '1. That the stage was "in possession of a rude outline of Falstaff before Shakspeare wrote either "part of HENRY IV., under the name of sir John Oldcastle. 2. That the "name of Oldcastle was retained for a term in Shakspeare's Henry IV., but "changed to Falstaff before the play was printed. 3. That, in all probability, "some of the theatres, in acting Henry IV., retained the name of Oldcastle, "after the author had made the alteration.'"

In one place in the first edition, one of Falstaff's speeches has Old. instead of Falst. prefixed; and the following line in the second scene retains a pun on his name:

"As the honey of Hybla, my OLD lad of the CASTLE."

So long as the Puritans were out of fashion, Oldcastle, the friend of Henry V. before he was king, and thrown off by him afterwards, could well be ridiculed on the stage. But when Foxe and such men were trying to make a martyr of him, and infant Puritanism was gaining favour, it was natural that the ridicule should be transferred, probably by authority of the queen, to another historical name.

It seems to me here is material for the discussion whether Shakspeare sympathized with the Puritans. AMER. EDIT.]

courts; and that the prisoners on their conviction should forfeit their lands, goods, and chattels, as in cases of felony*.

The restoration of tranquillity allowed the king to direct his attention towards the French throne, which was still occupied by an imbecile monarch, and was daily undermined by the rage of contending factions. Within the course of a few months the reins of government had successively passed from the hands of John the fearless duke of Burgundy, to the dauphin, a young prince, rash, headstrong, and capricious†; to the populace of the capital, whose ephemeral superiority had been accompanied with the imprisonment or massacre of the lords and ladies attached to the court‡; and lastly to the duke of Orleans, who persisted in waging a successful but impolitic war against the Burgundians, the ancient foes of his family. To the aspiring mind of Henry these troubles opened a most alluring prospect. He determined to revive the claim, and tread in the footsteps of his great-grandfather Edward III.; and, if he consented to a succession of short truces at the prayer of Charles, it was only that he might have leisure to mature his plans, to provide money for his expenses, and to open the war with an army adequate to his object. A little more than a year had elapsed from his accession when he unexpectedly demanded the crown of France, with all its appurtenances, as the heir of Isabella, daughter of Philip IV. The French ministers might have replied, that he was not the legitimate representative of that princess§: but they deemed the claim an insult to the national independence, and refused to admit it even as a subject of discussion. Henry therefore consented that Aug. Charles should continue to possess his throne, but required as the price of his forbearance conditions which would have reduced France to a secondary station among the powers of Europe: that he should cede to England in full sovereignty the provinces of Normandy, Maine, and Anjou; the territories which formerly composed the duchy of Aquitaine, and the several towns and counties included in the great peace of Bretigny; that he should put Henry in possession of one half of Provence, the inheritance of Eleanor and Sanchia, the queens of Henry III. and of his brother Richard, and two of the four daughters of Berenger, once sovereign of that country; that he should faithfully discharge the arrears of the ransom of king John, amounting to twelve hundred thousand crowns; and that he should give his daughter Catherine in marriage to the king of England with a portion of two millions of crowns*. To these demands Henry had been persuaded to descend by his council, who told him that by such moderation he would throw the blame of refusal on his adversaries, and "deserve through God's grace better speed and conclusion." The duke of Berri, the organ of the French government, replied, that Charles for the sake of peace was willing to restore all the territories anciently comprehended within the duchy of Aquitaine, and to give with his daughter six hundred thousand crowns, a greater portion than had ever been given on a similar occasion by any of his predecessors. By a prince of ordinary ambition such offers would have been cheerfully accepted. It was evident that they were made, not on account of the real superiority of England, but of the temporary embarrassments of France; and there was reason to fear that, if they should be refused, the different factions might unite against the common enemy, and by their

- Oct. 3. He recalled his ambassadors, summoned a parliament, avowed his intention of vindicating his right by arms, and obtained a supply of two tenths and two fifteenths†.
- Nov. 19. The grant of so large a sum created considerable alarm in the French court, and Henry resolved to make a second attempt by negotiation. A few days before the conclusion of the armistice the earl of Dorset, with the bishops of Durham and Norwich, and a retinue of six hundred horsemen, entered Paris, where, by their parade and magnificence, they surprised and mortified the vanity of the French‡. Their first object was easily attained, to prolong the truce during four months. They next proposed a treaty of peace and alliance on a new basis. The claim of Normandy, Maine, and Anjou, was entirely abandoned: they consented to accept the princess with half the sum originally required; but every other demand made by the late embassy was repeated and enforced. The duke of Berri gave the same answer, with this unimportant difference, that he offered eight instead of six hundred thousand crowns as the marriage portion of Catherine. The ambassadors immediately returned§.
- Mar. 14.

It is probable that the result of the negotiation was not displeasing to Henry. His counsellors might wish to avert the impending calamities of the war: but the young hero longed to encircle his brow with the laurels of a conqueror. A council of fifteen spiritual and twenty-eight temporal peers was immediately assembled: the king declared his resolution "to recover his inheritance" by arms||; and his speech was received with applause and assurances of support. The duke of Bedford, one of his brothers, accepted the office of regent during the royal absence; his duties and powers were specified; the members of the council appointed; and the terms of military service arranged*. The barons and knights, anxious to obtain renown, or to secure the royal favour, engaged to furnish troops according to their abilities; parliament granted two tenths and fifteenths; all alien priories not conventual, more than one hundred in number, were dissolved and given to the crown; Henry himself pawned his jewels, solicited loans, and by great exertions amassed the sum of five hundred thousand nobles†.

The French ministers had made no preparations to meet the storm with which they were threatened. Occupied in maintaining the ascendancy over their domestic rivals, they had flattered themselves that the king of England would accept the terms which had been offered him; and with this fallacious expectation they even now sent the archbishop of Bourges, and the earl of Vendôme, to repeat the proposals which had lately been made by the duke of Berri. The ambassadors were introduced to the king at Winchester: the next day Henry Chichely, who had lately succeeded to the archbishopric of Canterbury, informed them that his sovereign would accept nothing short of the restoration of all the territories which had ever been possessed by his predecessors; and Henry, following the primate, added,

* The following were the terms, and the manner of raising the army. 1. Contracts were made by the keeper of the privy seal with different lords and gentlemen, who bound themselves to serve with a certain number of men for a year, from the day on which they were first mustered. 2. The pay of a duke was to be 13s. 4d. per day; an earl, 6s. 5d.; a baron or banneret, 4s.; a knight, 2s.; an esquire, 1s.; an archer, 6d. 3. The pay, or security for its amount, was to be delivered by the treasurer a quarter of a year in advance: and if the money were not actually paid at the beginning of the fourth quarter, the engagement was to be at an end. As an additional remuneration, each contractor received "the usual regard," or douceur of 100 marks for every 30 men-at-arms. 4. A duke was to have 50 horses; an earl, 24; a baron or banneret, 16; a knight, 6; an esquire, 4; an archer, 1. The horses were to be furnished by the contractor, the equipment by the king. 5. All prisoners were to belong to the captors: but if they were kings, the sons of kings, or officers high in command bearing commissions from kings, they were to belong to the crown, on the payment of a reasonable recompence to the captors. 6. The booty taken was to be divided into three parts. Two remained to the men: the third was again divided into three parts, of which the leader took two, and left the third to the king. that the crown of France was his right, and that he would wrest it from its unjust possessor in defiance of all his enemies. These words aroused the spirit of the archbishop of Bourges, who, having previously obtained permission, replied ; that if the king attributed to fear the offers which had been made, he deceived himself. The throne of France was the most excellent in Europe. It would require more than the power of England to shake it. Let Henry, if he chose, make the attempt : he would either be driven back to the sea, or would pay the forfeit of his presumption with his liberty, perhaps with his life. As for himself, the archbishop added, that he had nothing more to do in England. He requested passports : but trusted that the king would give the answer in writing, and spare him the pain of delivering so insulting a message by word of mouth. Henry did not
 July 1. resent the freedom of the prelate, but dismissed him and his colleague with valuable presents*.

Every preparation was now complete : the army had assembled at Southampton ; and the king superintended the embarkation. At that very moment, while his mind was occupied with visions of conquest and glory, he was
 July 21. suddenly alarmed with the intelligence that a conspiracy against his life had been formed in the bosom of his own family and household. The ringleader was his cousin Richard, a brother to the duke of York, and lately created earl of Cambridge. The principal accomplices were sir Thomas Grey of Heton, a Northumbrian knight, and the lord Scrope of Masham, who had been honoured with the highest employments in the state, and was, both in bed and at board, at the council table and in the chase, the king's individual companion. What motives could induce them to form the design, or whence they derived their hopes of success, it is impossible to discover ; the historian must content himself with describing the facts

* See Monstrelet (i. 22), who praises the spirit, and Elmham (p. 30) and Walsingham (p. 389), who reprove the insolence of the French prelate. The king's answer is in Thresor des Chartres, 79.

as they appear upon record. By an inquest of twelve ^{Aug.} jurors of the county it was found, but on what testimony ^{2.} is not mentioned, that the earl of Cambridge had conspired with sir Thomas Grey to collect a body of armed men, to conduct the earl of March to the frontiers of Wales, and to proclaim him the rightful heir to the crown in case Richard II. were really dead * ; and had also by their emissaries solicited Thomas of Trumpyngton, who still personated Richard, Henry Percy, who had not yet returned from Scotland, and several Scottish lords, to invade the king's dominions at an appointed time ; and that the lord Scrope had received from them the knowledge of their treasonable intentions, had concealed that knowledge from the king and council, and had given to the conspirators his aid and abettance. On this indictment the prisoners were arraigned, and severally pleaded guilty : but the lord Scrope added, that his intention was innocent, as his only object in learning, was to defeat the plans of the conspirators. The usual judgment of treason was passed against Grey : but the king commuted the most disgraceful parts of the sentence. Instead of being drawn, he was permitted to walk to the place of execution, and suffered decapitation instead of being hanged. Cambridge and Scrope claimed the privilege of being tried by their peers. ^{Aug.} The duke of Cla-5. rence presided in the place of the king : all the lords in the army were summoned ; and the duke of York, that he might not sit in judgment on his brother, appointed the earl of Dorset his proxy. By this court both were condemned †, and after a fruitless appeal by the earl of Cambridge to the mercy of his royal relative, were executed. Though the earl of March sate among the judges at the trial, he soon afterwards received from Henry a general pardon for all treasons and offences : whence it has been inferred by some writers that he was privy to the conspiracy, and had secured the royal favour by betraying his accomplices. But the inference is not warranted by the practice of the age. Such pardons were frequently solicited by the most innocent, as a measure of precaution to defeat the malice, and prevent the accusations of their enemies*.

Henry's impatience had hastened the trial and execution of the conspirators. As soon as the wind would permit, he left Southampton; and after a rapid voyage entered the mouth of the Seine with a fleet of fifteen hundred sail, carrying six thousand men-at-arms and twenty-four thousand archers. Three days were consumed in landing the men, stores, and provisions; and immediately Harfleur, a strong fortress on the right bank of the river, was invested by land and blockaded by water. The knights in garrison, confident in their valour and numbers, repeatedly assailed the intrenchments of the besiegers: but successive defeats taught them to confine themselves within the walls; their defences were in a short time shattered or demolished by the artillery and the miners; and in the fifth week they submitted to an unconditional surrender. Henry seated himself on his throne under a magnificent tent, which was raised for the purpose on the summit of the hill, opposite to the town. On his right hand stood sir Robert Umfravile, bearing on the point of a lance the king's helmet surmounted with a crown: on each side were ranged the chief of the English nobility; and in this state the king received Gaucourte the governor, and thirty-four burgesses, who on their knees presented to him the keys of the town, and threw themselves on his mercy. He ordered his banner and that of St. George to be fixed over the principal gate, and pronounced his pleasure that the men-at-arms should depart in their doublets, after taking an oath to yield themselves prisoners within a fixed time to the governor of Calais; that the inhabitants, men, women, and children, should quit their homes for ever, carrying with them a portion of their clothes, and five pennies each to procure subsistence; and that the riches of the town, with the arms and horses of the garrison, should be faithfully distributed among the conquerors, according to their terms of service. Harfleur in his estimation had already become a second Calais: but its reduction had been purchased with the sacrifice of many officers and men, who perished not only from the casualties of the siege, but from the ravages of a dysentery caused by the dampness of the place, the immaturity of the fruits, and the exhalations from the putrid remains of animals slaughtered for the use of the camp. When the sick and wounded had been sent to England, and a competent garrison had been selected for the defence of the place, the army was reduced to one half of its former number; a force evidently too inconsiderable to attempt any expedition of importance*. But the king's honour was now at stake. He first sent a personal challenge to the dauphin, and, receiving no answer, took the bold and chivalrous resolution of marching to Calais through the hostile provinces of Normandy, Picardy, and Artois. It was in vain that the uselessness of so hazardous an expedition was represented by the majority of the council; the objections of prudence were opposed by the fear of incurring the imputation of cowardice; and every voice was silent, as soon as the king had declared that he would never shun the men who had unjustly seized his inheritance.

The army, consisting of nine hundred lances, and five Oct. thousand archers, proceeded in three grand divisions, 8. attended by two detachments, which alternately served as wings in the field, and as van and rear guards on the

- march*. At every step they were closely watched by strong bodies of the enemy, who, while they avoided an engagement, cut off the stragglers, and laid waste the country. The progress of the English† was slow. Often they were compelled to pass the day without food; and it was with difficulty that they could extort a scanty subsistence from the fears of the inhabitants in the villages where they rested during the night. As they crossed
- Oct. 11. the river Bresle, they were attacked by the garrison of Eu with loud shouts and amazing impetuosity†; but they received the assailants with coolness, and after a sharp contest drove them back to the fortress. Henry had intended, like his grandfather Edward III., to pass the Somme at Blanchetacque: but his scouts informed him that the ford was intersected with palisades, behind which had been posted strong bodies of archers and men-at-arms. Aware of his danger, he passed the night at Arrames, and avoiding Abbeville, where d'Albret, the constable of France, had established his head-quarters, proceeded to Bailleul. But d'Albret did not lose sight
- Oct. 13. of his enemy. From the right bank he watched the motions of the English, who, as they advanced along the opposite bank, had the mortification to find every ford broken up, and guarded by divisions of the hostile army. From the neighbourhood of Corbie the king, taking advantage of the winding of the river, cut across the country to Boves, and on his march thence to Neffles, halting

The constable had been obliged to pursue a more circuitous route by Peronne, whence he had sent forward orders to guard every ford higher up the river. But these orders had not been received, or had been neglected by the militia of St. Quintin's : and at Neffles Henry received advice, that the passage was still open at Voyenne and Bethencourt. Four bannerets with their pennons crossed immediately : the rest of the army with the baggage followed under their protection ; and in twelve hours the English had taken a safe position on the right bank. Henry marched forward to Monchy la Gauche : the constable fell back to Bapaume, and thence to St. Pôl.

Whilst that commander yet guarded the passages of the Somme, a military council had been held at Rouen in the presence of Charles, and a resolution was taken to give battle to the English by a majority of thirty-five voices to five. The twenty-fifth of the month was fixed for the day, and a proclamation was issued, calling on all true knights and loyal Frenchmen to join the constable by that time, wheresoever he might be. Henry was still at Monchy when three heralds were introduced to him by the duke of York. They delivered their message on their knees, announcing that their countrymen were ready to meet him in the field on the Friday following. The king answered with apparent indifference, that the will of God would be done. They inquired by what road he intended to march. "By that which leads straight to Calais," was his reply : "and if my enemies attempt to intercept me, it will be at their peril. I shall not seek them : but I will not move a step quicker or slower to avoid them. I could, however, have wished that they had adopted other counsels, instead of determining to shed the blood of Christians." It is probable that the last words alluded to the private challenge which the king had sent from Harfleur, and which, if we may believe his solemn declaration, had been made for the sole purpose of sparing the blood of men who had no personal interest in their quarrel. The heralds, who had delivered their message under considerable apprehensions, received a present of one hundred crowns, and returned impressed with a deep veneration for the character of the king*.

Oct. 24. The English continued their march leisurely and in good order. Leaving Peronne on their left, they passed through Encre and Lucheu to Blangy, where the deep and rapid stream of the Ternois intersected the road: but a detachment arrived in time to secure the bridge, which the French were preparing to demolish; and the whole army crossed without molestation. In a short time the duke of York discovered several large masses of the enemy marching in the direction of Azincourt; and Henry, having reconnoitred them from an eminence, gave orders to form in line of battle. The men remained in their ranks till it was dark: but as no enemy approached, they broke up in the evening, and advanced in silence by a white road which lay before them. Fortunately it led to Maisoncelles, a large village, where they found better food, and more comfortable accommodation than they had known for some weeks†.

It was with difficulty that the constable had checked the impetuosity of his followers, who are said to have amounted, at the lowest calculation, to one hundred thousand men. But he knew, that in the fatal battles of Creci and Poitiers, the French had been the assailants, and he determined on the present occasion to leave that dangerous honour to the English. To him delay could bring only new accessions of force: to them it was pregnant with famine and inevitable destruction. On this account he had selected a strong position in the fields in front of the village of Azincourt, through which it was necessary for the king of England to cut his way, unless he would consent to yield himself prisoner. His marshals had allotted their stations to the different divisions of the army; and each lord had planted his banner on the spot which he intended to occupy during the battle. The night was cold, dark, and rainy; but numerous fires illumined the horizon; and bursts of laughter and merriment were repeatedly heard from the French lines. The men collected round their banners, spent their time in revelling and debate, discussed the probable events of the next day, and fixed the ransom of the English king and his barons. No one suspected the possibility of defeat; and yet they could not be ignorant that they lay in the vicinity of the field of Creci *

To the English it was a night of hope and fear, of suspense and anxiety. They had been wasted with disease, broken with fatigue, and weakened by the many privations which must attend the march of an army through a hostile country, and in the presence of a superior force. But they were supported by the spirit and confidence of their gallant leader, and by the proud recollection of the victories won in similar circumstances by their fathers. As men, however, who had staked their lives on the issue of the approaching battle, they spent the intervening moments in making their wills, and in attending to the exercises of religion. The king himself took little repose. He visited the different quarters of the army, sent, as soon as the moon arose, officers to examine the ground, arranged the operations of the next day, ordered bands of music to play in succession during the night, and before sunrise summoned the men to attend at matins and mass. From prayer he Oct led them into the field, and arrayed them after his usual 25. manner in three divisions and two wings; but so near to each other, that they seemed to form but one body. The archers, on whom he rested his principal hope, were placed in advance of the men-at-arms. Their well-earned reputation in former battles, and their savage appearance on the present day, struck terror into their enemies. Many had stripped themselves naked: the others had bared their arms and breasts, that they might exercise their limbs with more ease and execution. Besides his bow and arrows, his battle-axe or sword, each bore the stake already mentioned on his shoulder, which he was instructed to fix obliquely before him in the ground, and thus oppose a rampart of pikes to the charge of the French cavalry. The king himself appeared on a grey palfrey, followed by a train of led horses ornamented with the most gorgeous trappings. His helmet was of polished steel, surmounted with a crown sparkling with jewels; and on his surcoat were emblazoned in gold the arms of England and France*. As he rode from banner to banner, cheering and exhorting the men, he chanced to hear an officer express a wish to his comrade that some of the good knights, who were sitting idle in England, might by a miracle be transported to the field of battle. "No," exclaimed Henry, "I would not have a single man more. If God give us the victory, it will be plain that we owe it to his goodness. If he do not, the fewer we are, the less will be the loss to our country. But fight with your usual courage, and God and the justice of our cause will protect us. Before night the pride of our enemies shall be humbled in the dust; and the greater part of that multitude shall be stretched on the field, or captives in our power†."

The French were drawn up in the same order, but with this fearful disparity in point of number, that while the English files were but four, theirs were thirty men deep‡. The constable himself commanded the ‡ Livius and Elmham observe that in the French lines were placed a number of military engines or cannons, to cast stones into the midst of the English (Liv. 19. Elm. 62). first division, the dukes of Bar and Alençon the second, the earls of Marle and Falconberg the third. The distance between the two armies scarcely exceeded a quarter of a mile: but the ground was wet and spongy; and D'Albret, faithful to his plan, ordered his men to sit down near their banners, and await in patience the advance of the enemy. Their inactivity disconcerted the king, who expected to be attacked. He improved the opportunity, however, to order a plentiful refreshment to be distributed through the ranks, while two detachments stole away unperceived by the French; of which one was instructed to lie in ambush in a meadow at Tramecourt, on their left flank, and the other to alarm them during the battle by setting fire to the houses in their rear. Just as the king had made every preparation for the attack, he was surprised by the approach of three French knights, who demanded permission to speak with him. One of them was the baron de Helly, who had been a prisoner in England, and was said to have broken his parole. He took the opportunity to deny the charge, and offered to meet in single combat between the two armies any man who should dare to repeat it. The king, who saw his object, instantly replied: "This is not a time for single combats. Go, tell your countrymen to prepare for battle before night, and doubt not that for the violation of your word, you will a second time forfeit your liberty, if not your life." "Sir," returned Helly, "I shall receive no orders from you. Charles is our sovereign. Him we obey: and for him we shall fight you, whenever we think proper." diately stepping forward, he exclaimed, "Banners, advance." At the same moment sir Thomas Erpingham threw his warder into the air; and the men, falling on their knees, bit the ground *, arose, shouted, and ran towards the enemy. At the distance of twenty paces they halted to recover breath, and then repeated the shout. It was echoed back by the detachment in the meadow, which issuing from its concealment, instantly assailed the left flank of the French. At the same moment the archers, having planted their stakes, ran before them, discharged their arrows, and retired behind their rampart. The constable had appointed a select battalion of eight hundred men-at-arms to break this formidable body. Of the whole number not more than seven score ever came into action. These were quickly despatched; the others, unable to face the incessant shower of arrows, turned their visors aside, and lost the government of their horses, which, frantic with pain, plunged in different directions into the close ranks of the first division. It was a moment of irremediable confusion. Nor did the archers lose the opportunity. Slinging their bows behind them, and with their swords or battle axes in their hands, they burst into the mass of the enemy, killed the constable and principal commanders, and in a short time totally dispersed the whole body †.

Henry, who had followed with the men-at-arms, ordered the archers to form again, and immediately charged the second division. The Frenchmen, though the fate

* A singulis in ore capta terræ particula. Tit. Liv. 18, 19. Elmh. 65. This singular custom had been introduced by the peasants of Flanders before the great victory, which they gained over the French cavalry at Courtray in 1302. A priest stood in front of the army, holding the consecrated host in his hand; and each man kneeling down, took a particle of earth in his mouth, as a sign of his desire, and an acknowledgment of his unworthiness, to receive the sacrament. of their fellows had checked their presumption, met the shock with courage, and maintained for two hours a most bloody and doubtful contest. The king's life was repeatedly in imminent danger. Seeing his brother, the duke of Clarence, wounded and lying on the ground, he hastily strode across his body, and bravely repelled the efforts of the assailants, till the prince was safely removed by his own servants. Soon afterwards he was charged by a band of eighteen French knights, who had bound themselves to each other to kill him or take him prisoner. One of them with a stroke of his mace brought the king on his knees: but he was instantly rescued by his guards, and his opponents were all slain. At length the duke of Alençon, the French commander, fought his way to the royal standard. With one stroke he beat the duke of York to the ground; with a second he cleaved the crown on the king's helmet. Every arm was instantly uplifted against him. The duke, aware of his danger, exclaimed, "I yield: I am Alençon." Henry held out his hand: but his gallant enemy had already fallen. The death of the duke was followed by the flight of the survivors*.

There still remained the third and most numerous division of the enemy. Though dismayed, it was yet unbroken; and the English were preparing for the charge, when the alarming intelligence arrived that a powerful force approached the rear of the army. In this emergency the king hastily gave orders that all the prisoners should be put to death; orders which in most instances were unfortunately executed before the mistake could be discovered. The force, which had been so greatly magnified, consisted only of six hundred peasants under Robinet de Bournonville, and Ysambert d'Azincourt; who had profited of the moment to enter Maisonnelles, plunder the baggage, and drive away the horses of the army. That this enterprise should prove so disastrous to their countrymen, they could not have foreseen : but they were afterwards called to account, and severely punished by their immediate lord, the duke of Burgundy*.

During this interval, the ranks of the third division began to waver ; and their irresolution was augmented by the flames kindled in their rear by the English detachment. Of the whole number no more than six hundred could be persuaded to follow their leaders, the earls of Falconberg and Marle, who boldly rushed on the conquerors, and found, what they probably sought, captivity or an honourable death. The English were in no condition to pursue the fugitives. As soon as resistance ceased, the king with his barons traversed the field, while the heralds examined the arms and numbered the bodies of the slain. He then called to him Montjoy the French king-at-arms, and asked him to whom the victory belonged. "To you, sir," replied Montjoy. "And what," continued the king, "is that castle, which I see at a distance?"—"It is called the castle of Azincourt," was the answer. "Then," resumed Henry, "let this battle be known by the name of the battle of Azincourt†."

The blood shed on this day was drawn from the noblest families in France. Among the slain were numbered eight thousand knights and esquires, more than a hundred bannerets, seven counts, the three dukes of Brabant, Bar, and Alençon, and the constable and admiral of France‡. The most distinguished of the prisoners were the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and the counts of Eu, Vendôme, and Richemont. The loss of the conquerors amounted to sixteen hundred men, with the earl of Suffolk, and the duke of York. They left Maissoncelles the next morning, and resumed their march Oct. towards Calais. As they crossed the field of battle, they^{26.} killed such of the wounded as still retained any appearance of life; and the moment they were gone, the hope of plunder conducted to the spot thousands of both sexes from the neighbouring villages. The foreign soldiers had carried off every article of value: these native plunderers stripped the slain of their clothes, and left more than ten thousand dead bodies naked on the ground*. The count of Charolois, son of the duke of Burgundy, ordered the dead to be interred at his own expense. Those, which it was possible to recognise, were buried in the nearest churches, or conveyed to the tombs of their ancestors. The rest, to the number of five thousand eight hundred, were deposited in three long and deep pits dug in the field of battle. This vast cemetery was surrounded with a strong inclosure of thorns and trees, which pointed out to succeeding generations the spot where the resolution of a few Englishmen triumphed over the impetuous but ill-directed valour of their numerous enemies†.

At Calais Henry assembled a council, in which it was determined to return to England. The army, indeed, ^{Oct} wasted with disease, fatigue, and the casualties of war, 29. was not in a condition to resume offensive operations: but the argument, which chiefly weighed with the king, will probably surprise the reader. It was maintained that the last expedition had sufficiently demonstrated his right to the crown of France; that God, by granting him the victory at Azincourt, had given the divine

- sanction to his claim; and that the same providence would hereafter furnish him with the opportunity of again seeking and ultimately recovering his inheritance. The parliament partook of the general enthusiasm. It ordered the tenth and fifteenth voted the last year to be levied immediately, added another tenth and fifteenth to be levied within twelve months, granted the king tonnage and poundage for the safeguard of the sea, and settled on him for life the subsidy on wool, wool-fells, and leather‡.

Among those who sought to extinguish the schism, occasioned by the two pretenders to the papacy, no one had laboured more earnestly than Sigismund king of the Romans, and emperor elect; and, as the co-operation of the kings of England and France was deemed necessary for the success of his endeavours, he cheerfully undertook to visit, and, if it were possible, to reconcile the two monarchs. In France he was received with honour, held Mar. several conferences with Charles and his ministers, and ^{1.} with their approbation proceeded on his journey. Henry endeavoured, by the most magnificent preparations, to convince his guest of his opulence and resources. By royal proclamation all the knights and esquires in the April kingdom were summoned to the capital to attend on ^{7.} their sovereign; a fleet of three hundred sail assembled at Calais for the conveyance of Sigismund and his retinue, amounting to a thousand horsemen; and officers were appointed to escort him from Dover to London, and to defray his expenses on the road*. But before his arrival a story was told, which created some perplexity in the king's mind. It had chanced that curiosity led the emperor to witness the proceedings in the parliament of Paris: through courtesy he was invited to occupy the throne; and as, during the pleadings, one of the parties was in danger of being nonsuited, because he was only an esquire, Sigismund drew his sword, and dubbed him a knight. It was probably a harmless action, proceeding from the mere impulse of the moment: but by the spectators it was reprov'd, and in England was represented as an undue assumption of power in virtue of the imperial dignity†. Henry determined to preserve the rights and independence of his crown; and, as soon as the emperor's ship cast anchor in the harbour, the duke of Gloucester and several noblemen rode into the water with their swords drawn, and inquired whether the imperial stranger meant to exercise or claim any authority or jurisdiction in England. He replied in the negative, and was immediately received with all the honours due to the first sovereign in Europe‡.

and exhortations of William of Bavaria, duke of Holland, and count of Hainault. Before them Henry explained his right to the kingdom of France; and alluding to his late victory, claimed the praise of moderation, when he offered to resign that right, on condition that the treaty of Bretigny should be faithfully executed in all its provisions. It is hardly credible that the French ministers could have advised their sovereign to accept of a proposal which must have deprived him of one half of his dominions; though the emperor, when he afterwards entered into an alliance with Henry, accused Charles of having given to it a full but treacherous assent*. Nothing in reality was more foreign from the present policy of the French court than humiliating concession. To the dauphin, who was lately dead, had succeeded in the administration of affairs the count of Armagnac, a nobleman of distinguished talents and approved intrepidity. Anxious to signalise his entry into office with the recovery of Harfleur, he obstinately rejected every proposal for a truce, drew lines round the town, and with a fleet of French ships, and Genoese carracks, blockaded the harbour. The earl of Dorset, who commanded in Harfleur, earnestly solicited a supply of troops and provisions; and Henry himself would have sailed to the relief of his first conquest had he not been restrained by the remonstrances of Sigismund, who deemed it an enterprise of less consequence than to require the presence of the sovereign. The earl of Huntingdon accepted the command, and after a rough and dilatory passage reached the mouth of the Seine. At a spear's length: but the deficiency was supplied by the native courage of the combatants, who climbed up the sides, boarded the enemy, and made themselves masters of the carracks. Most of the French ships had previously struck: a few escaped up the river; and Harfleur was relieved*.

France still continued to present the same lamentable scene of confusion. The two parties ardently sought the extinction of each other; and, as long as the Armagnacs maintained their ascendancy in the councils of Charles, the duke of Burgundy was urged by the motive of self-preservation to seek a counterpoise in the friendship of Henry. During the last campaign he had forbidden his vassals to serve in the French army according to the summons from their sovereign, and had allowed his county of Flanders to be declared neutral, for the advantage of the commercial intercourse between the natives and England: but he had cautiously abstained from entering into engagements with Henry, or lending assistance to the invading army. In the present year a continual correspondence was maintained between the two courts. The ostensible object was the regulation of trade; the real cause, the desire of each prince to derive advantage from the personal quarrel of the other. In the beginning of September the king of England, the emperor, who had concluded an alliance Sept. with his host, and had been enrolled a knight of the 4. garter, and the count of Hainault, repaired to Calais, where they were met according to appointment by the Burgundian†. This congress surprised and alarmed Oct. the French ministers; nor could their envoys, who attended under pretence of soliciting a truce, discover the secret designs of the four powers. Men would not believe that they had assembled, as it was given out, for the sole purpose of deliberating on the state of the church, and the means of extinguishing the schism;

and it was whispered that the duke, through enmity to the Armagnacs, had solicited the protection of Henry, had formally acknowledged his claim to the French crown, and had done homage to him for Burgundy and Alost. The French cabinet gave full credit to the report; and to mark their abhorrence of his conduct, ordered the Burgundian prelates and envoys at Constance to be excluded from the meetings of the French nation: but there is reason to think that the duke was calumniated, and that, if such proposals were made to him at Calais, he rejected them as incompatible with his interests, or his honour*.

From the congress Henry returned to England to obtain supplies from his parliament, and to make preparation for a second expedition. Sigismund proceeded through Dordrecht to Constance, to support by his presence the prelates who sought, by the deposition of the contending pontiffs, to restore the peace of the church. The duke of Burgundy retired to put in execution the plans which he had formed for his own aggrandizement, but which he had carefully concealed from Henry. At Valenciennes he met the second son of the king of France, who, on the death of his elder brother, had assumed the title of dauphin. The two princes instantly swore eternal friendship to each other: the dauphin engaged to unite with the duke in removing the Armagnacs from the administration; the duke to assist the dauphin in his opposition to the claim of the king of England. But this union was speedily dissolved by the unexpected death of his young ally: and the moment that event was known, his unprincipled mother, Isabel of Bavaria, was

* Rym. ix. 397. 401. 436. Monst. i. 240. That such proposals were indeed made appears from the protocol of a treaty preserved by Rymer, in which the duke was made to say, that though he formerly doubted, he was now convinced of Henry's right to the French crown; to promise that he would do him homage, as soon as he should have conquered a notable portion of France; and to engage to make war on A. B. C. if they should oppose the king's pretensions. This, though no more than a draught of a treaty without date or signature, shows what was demanded from him. arrested by order of her husband, stripped of her treasures, and sent a captive to the city of Tours. The duke seized the opportunity to send a circular letter to all the towns and cities in France. He charged his opponents with having administered poison to the dauphin, attributed to their rapacity and ambition all the evils which afflicted the kingdom, and claimed the aid of every good Frenchman to reform the government, and punish the traitors. At the head of sixty thousand cavalry he marched towards Paris. Many cities and towns opened their gates through fear of his resentment; by others he was welcomed as the saviour of his country: but the Armagnacs defied his power from the walls of the capital, and quelled the efforts of his partisans within the city. Isabel had been hitherto his bitterest enemy: her captivity taught her to solicit his assistance, and to offer her co-operation against the men who were equally enemies of them both. Early one morning, under pretence of devotion, she prevailed on her keepers to accompany her to a church in the suburbs of Tours: in a few minutes she was in the hands of her deliverer, the duke himself, who during the night had arrived with eight hundred men-at-arms in a neighbouring forest. She immediately assumed the title of regent during the minority of the king, and by proclamation appointed the duke of Burgundy her lieutenant*.

This rapid view of the state of parties in France was necessary to explain the conduct and subsequent success of the king of England. When the Burgundian commenced his march towards Paris, Henry landed Aug. without opposition on the coast of Normandy. But the¹ failure of his former attempt had taught him to pursue a different policy. He no longer sought to irritate the vanity of his enemies by an insulting but dangerous march through the country. He came prepared to make permanent conquests; and his army, amounting to sixteen thousand men-at-arms, and probably an equal number of archers, was provided with a long train of artillery and military engines, and a useful body of artificers and sappers*. It was in vain that he called on the Normans to receive him as their lawful duke. At the expiration of two centuries, the natives felt nothing of that attachment for the descendants of Rollo, which had animated their ancestors: they looked on Henry as a foreign adventurer; and defended their country with the most steady, and often enthusiastic bravery. But they received no aid from their countrymen: they were even deprived of the presence and example of their nobles, whom the Armagnacs detained at Paris to oppose the efforts of the Burgundians; and fortress after fortress fell into the hands of the invaders. Touques, Auvillers, and Villers surrendered after short sieges: if Caen refused to capitulate, it was carried by assault; Bayeux submitted spontaneously, and obtained the confirmation of its privileges; and the campaign was terminated by the successive reduction of l'Aigle, Lisieux, Alençon, and Falaise†. During its continuance the French government did not attempt to oppose the king in the field, but solicited a peace or an armistice. Henry, however, would not suffer his career to be interrupted by negotiation; and, when at last he consented to listen to the

Ibid. They also furnished an equal number of archers mounted. The rest of the army, making up the gross amount of 16,400 men-at-arms, were the king's retainers, and private knights, who had entered into his service. Some of the numbers are incorrectly printed in Livius: but the mistakes may be corrected by comparing the number of archers with the number of men-at-arms.

Of these 117, named logge-ships, had been taken up in Holland, Zealand, and the neighbouring ports: 122 were English, distinguished by the following names—doggers, faircoasts, balingers, loadships, ships, craieres, collets, barges, picards, skiffs, and passagers. envoys, cut short the conference by the inadmissible tenor of his demands. He would grant neither peace nor armistice, but on condition that Catherine, the daughter of Charles, should consent to become his wife; that the regency of the kingdom should be given to him during the lifetime of the king; and that he should be declared his successor in the event of his death*.

But while Henry was thus occupied with the conquest of Normandy a feeble attempt had been made to deprive him of England. In consequence of a secret understanding between the Scottish cabinet and the chiefs of the lollards, the duke of Albany and the earl Douglas suddenly crossed the borders, and laid siege, the former to the castle of Berwick, the latter to that of Roxburgh. It proved, however, a "foul raid." They had persuaded themselves that the kingdom had been left without a competent force for its protection; but, when they learned that the dukes of Bedford and Exeter were approaching at the head of a numerous force, they decamped with precipitation, and disbanded their armies†. At the same time sir John Oldcastle emerged from his concealment, and arrived in the neighbourhood of London. The retreat of the Scots defeated all his projects. At St. Alban's he eluded by a precipitate flight the pursuit of his enemies: but was taken near Broniart, in Montgomeryshire, after an obstinate resistance, by the retainers of sir Edward Charlton, lord of Powis‡. At the petition of the commons (the parliament was then sitting) he was arraigned before the peers; the indictment on which he had been formerly outlawed was read; and he was asked in the usual form by the duke of Bedford why he should not receive sentence of death. Instead of replying directly to the question, he preached a long sermon on one of the favourite doctrines of his sect, that it is the duty of man to forgive, and to leave the punishment of offences in the hands of the Almighty. Being interrupted, and required to return a direct answer, he said that he would never acknowledge the authority of that court, as long as his liege lord king Richard II. was alive in Scotland. Judgment was instantly pronounced, that he should be hanged as a traitor, and burnt as a heretic. St. Giles's fields, which had been the theatre of his rebellion, witnessed also his punishment. By his partisans he would have been revered as a martyr, had not their faith been staggered and scandalised by the non-accomplishment of a prophecy, which he was said to have uttered at the gallows, that he should rise from the grave on the third day*.

In the spring Henry resumed his victorious career; A.D. and by a reinforcement of fifteen thousand men, was 1418. enabled to divide his army, and undertake several operations at the same time. Cherbourg, after a resistance of six months, opened its gates: the whole of Lower Normandy was reduced; and the king proceeded to settle the government of his conquests. He appointed a treasurer and chancellor of the duchy; granted his protection to all who swore fealty; abolished the odious tax upon salt; and by the distribution of favours and the suppression of grievances, sought to attach the natives to the person of their new sovereign†. His progress was viewed with indifference by the rival chiefs, who, to gratify their own ambition, scrupled not to sacrifice the independence of their country. A project of reconciliation, framed by the cardinals Ursini and St. Mark, had been gratefully accepted by the duke of Burgundy, and indignantly rejected by his opponents. From that moment the latter were stigmatised as the enemies of peace, and their interest visibly declined even within the walls of the capital. One night a gate of the city was treacherously opened to a party of Burgundians, who were instantly joined by thousands of citizens; and the king unable to stem the torrent, reluctantly gave his sanction to their proceedings. A general arrest followed, and the count of Armagnac, several ladies and bishops, the lords of the council, the officers of the treasury, and the members of the parliament were thrown into confinement. But the leaders of the Burgundians were not yet satisfied. By reports and accusations they goaded the passions of the populace to a state of madness; and on ~~June~~ the night of the twelfth of June sixty thousand persons¹² assembled in arms, broke open the gaols, and without distinction of rank or sex, guilt or innocence, massacred all the prisoners. At the same time perished numbers of those who were known or suspected to be hostile to the party: but one individual, Charles, the third and only surviving son of the king, escaped by the care of Tanneui du Chastel, who took him out of bed, wrapped him in a sheet, and carried him to a place of safety. After these horrors the queen, accompanied by the duke of Burgundy, entered Paris in triumph, and having possession of the king's person, exercised without opposition the royal authority*. But the remains of the opposite faction repaired to Poitiers, proclaimed the young dauphin regent of the kingdom, and established a rival administration. Thus France was divided into two separate governments, more hostile to each other than to their natural enemy, the king of England, and equally desirous to purchase by concessions his assistance for their own interest. Henry listened to their proposals, but obstinately refused to accept them. It was his policy to play off one party against the other; that by working on their apprehensions, he might induce them to rise in their offers. When his ministers met the envoys of the dauphin at Alençon, they assumed a ~~Nov.~~ tone of the most insulting superiority. It was not for 10. them to bring forward any project: they had come to receive the proposals of the dauphin. The crown of France was the rightful inheritance of Henry. What could his adversary give him as an equivalent? When they had thus drawn from the French negotiators a declaration of the offer, which they had been authorized to make, they upbraided them with a want of sincerity; questioned the validity of the powers with which they had been furnished; and hinted a doubt whether their master at so early an age could give sufficient security for the fulfilment of his engagements*. This conference was hardly terminated, when a second was opened under the mediation of the cardinal Ursini, with the envoys of the king of France and the duke of Burgundy. They

 4. Catherine: but the politician would not permit the charms of the lady to weigh in the balance against his interests. During a fortnight he practised upon the hopes and fears, and prejudices of the negotiators; and then dismissed them with the remark, that Charles from his infirmity, and the duke from his inferior rank as a vassal, were equally incapable of disposing of the territories belonging to the French crown†.

The negotiations for peace had not interrupted the July operations of war; and Henry from the reduction of
 19. Pont de l'Arche advanced to lay siege to Rouen, the capital of Upper Normandy. In time of peace its population was estimated at two hundred thousand souls: but the approach of the enemy had prompted numbers to emigrate; and the magistrates by proclamation had urged the departure of all, who were not furnished with provisions for ten months. By the French a confident hope was indulged that Rouen would arrest the victo-

It was at last agreed that two copies of every instrument should be made, one in each language, and that in case of dispute the Latin should be deemed the authentic copy. rious career of the English monarch. Its fortifications were strong; numerous batteries covered its walls; the Seine winding round it, served to protect it from insult; and to fifteen thousand citizens trained to war had been added four thousand men-at-arms under the command of Guy le Bouteillier, an officer of approved valour and the most ardent patriotism. By his orders the suburbs were immediately burnt, the ground levelled in the neighbourhood of the walls, and the country around reduced to the state of a naked wilderness. At the approach of the English, he boldly met them in the open field; and, though he was repulsed by superior numbers, continued daily to repeat his attacks, destroying their works, beating up their quarters, and disconcerting their operations. The army encamped in six divisions, opposite to the six gates of the city; and to preserve the communication between them, trenches were opened sufficiently deep to screen the passengers from the shot of the enemy. I shall neglect the events of the siege: but the works erected, and the precautions taken by Henry are, from their connexion with the history of the military art, more deserving of notice. The natural and artificial strength of the place, with the number and courage of the garrison, forbade a hope that Rouen could be reduced by force: but it might be starved into submission; and to prevent the introduction of supplies became the great object of the king's solicitude. Lines were drawn round the city, and strengthened with thick hedges of thorns; and without the camp the most commanding situations were chosen, and fortified with towers of wood, batteries of cannon, and engines for the projection of arrows. Still the Seine remained open to the besieged. But a bridge was soon thrown across it above the city; and near the bridge was moored a squadron of boats, which with incredible exertion had been dragged over the land by the labour of men and horses. Below, the navigation was impeded by two booms, each consisting of three strong chains of iron * ; and the mouth of the river was carefully watched by a Portuguese fleet in the pay of the English monarch. Two hundred sail of small vessels, employed for the purpose, poured daily supplies of provisions into the camp of the besiegers : but within the walls the privations of famine began to be felt before the expiration of two months. Twelve thousand individuals were expelled from the city by order of the governor. Henry forbade them to be admitted within the lines ; and, though a few were supported by the humanity of the troops, the rest perished through want of shelter and food. During the next month the besieged were content to feed on the flesh of their horses ; and when that resource failed, contrived for ten weeks to protract their defence with no other nourishment than reptiles and weeds. It was calculated that the number of those, who fell victims to famine and disease, had amounted to fifty thousand. The survivors, by a trusty messenger to the French court, described their sufferings, and demanded relief. He returned with flattering but fallacious promises ; he even announced the very day, which had been fixed for their deliverance. At the news every eye glistered with hope : the bells were rung ; rejoicings were made ; and each combatant was admonished to be on his guard, and to second the efforts of his friends. The day came : it passed, and no deliverer appeared.

A. D. 1419. The despair of the garrison now subdued the obstinacy of the governor : but, when he solicited a capitulation, Henry rejected his offers, and insisted that he should surrender at discretion. Le Bouteillier assembled his men, and proposed to them to set fire to the city, to throw down that part of the wall which had been undermined, and to burst in a mass into the camp of the enemy ; where, if they could not win a way with their swords, they would at least find an honourable death.

* One chain was suspended 18 inches within the water, the second level with the surface, the third three feet above it. Mons. 263.

The knowledge of the design changed the determination of Henry, who had no wish that Rouen should be reduced to a heap of ashes. He gave the men-at-arms their lives and liberty, on condition that they should not Jan. serve against him for twelve months: of the citizens he 13. required a contribution of three hundred thousand crowns, in consideration of which they preserved their property and the franchises of the city. The other fortresses followed the example of the capital; and the Normans submitted to wear the red cross, the distinguishing badge of the English nation*.

The fall of Rouen was felt to the very extremities of France. It might have been hoped that the adverse factions would now forget their animosities, and unite against the common enemy: but every attempt to reconcile them proved ineffectual; and each had again recourse to a separate negotiation with Henry. The duke of Burgundy requested a renewal of the conferences for peace: the dauphin solicited a personal interview. For reasons which are not mentioned, the young prince did not keep his appointment†; and the duke, improving the opportunity, affected a willingness to assent to the demands of the English king, who was even persuaded to undertake in person the conduct of the negotiation. Mantes was assigned for the residence of Henry, Pontoise for that of Charles. Between these towns and in a plain near Meulent, was marked out a square plot of ground, of which one side was washed by the Seine, the other three were enclosed with a deep trench and a line of palisades. The mast of a ship erected in the centre designated the spot, where it was intended that the kings should meet; and two magnificent pavilions, standing near it, offered them the convenience of withdrawing from the view of the spectators. The ground without the enclosure on the right was allotted to the attendants of Henry, that on the left to the attendants of Charles; and for their accommodation tents were erected, in the decorations of which the two nations strove to outvie each other. It chanced that on the appointed day the king of France suffered an access of his disorder: but in the morning Isabella, her daughter Catherine, and the duke of Burgundy, left Pontoise with a retinue of one thousand horse; and Henry, accompanied by his brothers of Clarence and Gloucester, departed at the same time from Mantes, escorted by an equal number of men-at-arms. At a signal they entered the enclosure from the opposite sides, and met in the centre at the same moment. Henry bowed to Isabella and her daughter, saluted them, and taking the former by the hand led her into the pavilion. It was the first time that he had seen his intended bride. She was young, graceful, and beautiful; and by the instruction of the queen employed all her charms to make an impression on the heart of the conqueror. Though Henry strove to suppress, he could not conceal, his emotions from the inquisitive eye of the mother. This was sufficient for Isabella. From that moment the daughter was withdrawn from the conferences. It was hoped that her absence would irritate the king's passion, and thus induce him to consent to more favourable conditions*.

The first conference was employed in arranging the order of the subsequent discussions. Two days later Henry stated his demand; the possession of Normandy, his other conquests and the territories ceded by the peace of Bretigny, to be held in full sovereignty, and independently of the French crown. Four days elapsed, when the ministers of Charles returned their answer. They made no objection to the king's pretensions ; but brought forward eight demands on the part of their own sovereign, respecting renunciations, exchanges of territory, and the payment of debts. Henry fondly persuaded himself that he should at last obtain the prize of his labours. Yet doubts were artfully started, explanations required, and the intervals between the conferences prolonged. In a whole month no more than seven meetings were held; a July day had been appointed for the eighth: but the French 3. ministers did not appear, and Henry discovered that his own arts had been turned against himself. The conference, conducted at Meulent with so much parade was but a feint: the real negotiation was carried on between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, whose respective demands and replies had been conveyed from one to the other by the secret agency of madame de Giac. The day after the interruption of the conferences the two July princes met and embraced near Melun on the road to 4. Paris. They bound themselves by oath to forget their former quarrel, to live in amity, to concert measures July which might heal the dissensions in the kingdom, and 14. to unite their forces against their enemy the king of England*.

Never had Henry experienced a more cruel disappointment: but his passion was gratified by the surprise of Pontoise, a populous town in the neighbourhood of Paris. He immediately published a manifesto, in which he boasted of his moderation, complained of the fraud of his opponents, and offered, notwithstanding the insult so lately received, to conclude a peace on the terms which he had formerly proposed; but with this proviso, that Pontoise, with the country lying between that town and Normandy, should be included among the territories to be ceded to the English crown †. His prospects, however, began to darken. The duration and expenses of the war had provoked the remonstrances of his subjects; the king of Castile had fitted out an armament, which swept the coast of Guienne, and threatened the city of Bayonne; and the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy were preparing to array against him the whole power of France. But if others doubted, he still appeared confident of success; and within a few days that confidence was converted into certainty by an unexpected revolution, which placed one of the two factions at his disposal, and involved the other in calamity and disgrace.

Two months had elapsed since the apparent reconciliation of the dauphin and the Burgundian; yet their correspondence showed how deeply they mistrusted the sincerity of each other. The duke importuned the prince to join his father's council at Troyes: the prince required that the duke should previously meet him at Montreau sur Yonne. It was not without hesitation that the latter complied. As he approached the town, he was told that three barriers, with a gate in each, had been
Sept. drawn across the bridge; but at the same time a courier
10. informed him that the dauphin had already waited his arrival more than an hour on the opposite bank. Both circumstances awakened his suspicions: he consulted his friends; and a hasty determination was taken to proceed, that he might not afterwards be accused of having by groundless jealousies replunged his country into civil dissension. With twelve attendants the duke passed the first and second gates, which were immediately locked behind him. Before he reached the third the dauphin appeared. He bent his knee, and was addressing the prince, when he received a stroke in the face from a small axe in the hand of Tannegui du Chastel. It was in vain that he grasped his sword: a multitude of wounds instantly laid him dead on the ground. Of his attendants one vaulted over the barrier, and escaped; a second was slain; the others remained captives in the power of the assassins. To apologise for this foul murder recourse was had to the same plea, by which the Burgundian himself had once attempted to justify that of the duke of Orleans; that when a criminal is too powerful to be punished according to law, it is the duty of every loyal subject to make himself the minister of public justice. Whatever might be his guilt, the circumstances of the assassination perpetrated under the mask of friendship, in violation of the most solemn oaths, and in the presence of the dauphin, fixed an indelible stain on the character of that prince. Perhaps some extenuation may be found in his youth, and the violence of his counselors; and perhaps some credit may be given to his repeated asseverations, that he had been kept in ignorance of the design till it was carried into execution*.

This tragical event excited throughout the kingdom one common feeling of detestation and horror. Every other interest was forgotten; and the former cry for the salvation of the country was drowned in the still louder cry for revenge on the murderers. To the partisans of the late duke it was evident that their security depended on the ruin of the dauphin, and the protection of the king of England. The city of Paris hastened to conclude an armistice†; Philip, son and heir to John, solicited his aid and friendship: and Isabella informed him, that whatever arrangements he should make with that prince would be cheerfully ratified by Charles. Henry was not slow to name the price at which he would consent to be the minister of their vengeance, or rather of his own ambition. He required the hand of the princess Catherine, the regency of the kingdom during the life of the king, and the succession to the crown at his death. Blinded by passion and personal interest, the queen and the duke signified their assent. Within ten² weeks after the murder these important preliminaries were signed; it employed five months to settle the minor arrangements. By these Henry bound himself to settle on Catherine the usual income of an English queen, amounting to twenty thousand nobles; to govern during his regency with the advice of a council of natives; to conquer the territories now in possession of the dauphin for the benefit of his father-in-law; to lay aside the title of king of France during the reign of that monarch; to re-annex Normandy to the French crown as soon as he should ascend the throne; to preserve the parliaments, peers, nobles, cities, towns, commonalties, and all individuals in the full enjoyment of their liberties; and to administer justice according to the laws and customs of the kingdom*. At length, accompanied by sixteen thousand men-at-arms, he entered Troyes, the residence of the French court†. The "perpetual peace" was ratified the next day by Isabella and Philip as commissioners of Charles; the parliament, nobles, citizens, and commonalties, actually acknowledging his authority, swore to observe it; and the union of the two crowns was celebrated with every outward demonstration of joy. According to the national custom Henry and Catherine were first affianced to each other. Then after a short interval the marriage was celebrated; and two days later the "the regent and heir of France," with his beautiful bride, departed from Troyes to assume the command at the siege of Sens‡.

It should, however, be observed that this sentence was issued against the murderers in general, without naming any individual. ceremony they made a progress through the kingdom. but at York their joy was clouded with the melancholy news of the battle of Beaujé. The duke of Clarence, whom the king had appointed his lieutenant in Normandy, undertook to lay waste the county of Anjou, which still recognised the authority of the dauphin. To oppose him La Fayette had assembled an army of the natives, to whom he joined five or seven thousand Scottish auxiliaries under the earls of Buchan and Wigton, and the lord Stuart of Darnley. The duke suffered himself to be deceived by the false reports of the prisoners. Despising the advice of his officers, he hastened
 Mar. 22. without the archers to surprise the enemy; and was surrounded with his men-at-arms by a more numerous force. Twelve hundred of the English remained on the field; three hundred were taken. The duke, who was distinguished by his coronet of gold and jewels, received a wound from sir William Swynton, and was slain with a battle-axe by the earl of Buchan. The archers arrived in time to recover his body: but the enemy, who retired in haste, carried off the prisoners. This victory raised the fame of the Scots, and their general was named by the dauphin constable of France*.

Revenge and vexation speedily recalled the king to the theatre of war. Troops were ordered to assemble at Dover; loans were raised in every county; and the parliament and convocation were summoned. Both, at Henry's request, approved and ratified the treaty of Troyes†. The clergy voted him a tenth: from the lords the council to raise loans for the use of the crown on the security of parliament *. Anxious to wreak his vengeance on the men who had slain his brother, the king resolved to oppose Scot to Scot, and to procure the ministers of his resentment from among their own countrymen. Archibald earl Douglas, in consideration of an May annuity of two hundred pounds, contracted to serve him ^{30.} during his life, with two hundred men-at-arms, and two hundred foot soldiers; and James the young king of Scotland, who had now spent sixteen years in captivity, on a promise that he should revisit his own country within three months after his return, consented to accompany the expedition in quality of a volunteer. He probably was not aware of the object of Henry; who indulged a hope that the Scots in the pay of the dauphin would not venture to fight against their native sovereign. In this he was disappointed: but the presence of James afforded him a pretext to gratify his revenge; and every Scot taken in arms was immediately executed as a traitor †.

The king landed at Calais with a reinforcement of four thousand men-at-arms, and twenty-four thousand June archers ‡. By his orders they proceeded towards the ^{10.} seat of war under the command of the earl of Dorset, while he paid a rapid but welcome visit to his father-in-law at the Bois de Vincennes. Returning to the army, he drove the dauphin from the walls of Chartres: and, leaving the king of Scots to besiege Dreux, chased his adversary into the strong city of Bourges. Thence, to pay his court to the Parisians, he repaired to the capital; and at their request undertook to reduce the city of Oct. Meaux. Its commander was the celebrated bastard of ^{6.}

Vaurus, whose activity and barbarity had rendered him an object of terror and detestation. Bursting from his asylum with unexampled rapidity, he often swept the whole country to the very gates of Paris; and was accustomed on his return to hang on a particular tree every prisoner, who would not, or could not, pay the ransom which he demanded. The town at the end of ten weeks was carried by storm: but the garrison retired into an adjoining work called the market-place;

The governor was decapitated. His banner, surmounted with his head, was fixed in his favourite tree, and his trunk suspended from one of the branches. With him were executed three of his officers, who had earned the distinction by their insolence and inhumanity: a few persons, accused of having participated in the murder of the duke of Burgundy, were sent to Paris, to take their trials before the parliament*.

By the surrender of Meaux the northern division of France from the frontier to the Loire, with the exception of Maine, Anjou, and a few castles in Picardy, was brought to acknowledge the authority of the king of England; and to add to his good fortune, his queen had lately been delivered of a son, who had received in baptism the name of his father. As soon as Meaux was reduced, she left England, in the company of the duke of Bedford, and hastened with her child to her father and mother at the Bois de Vincennes. Henry flew to join her; and the two courts repaired together to Paris against the festival of Whitsuntide. The citizens gazed at the magnificence of the regent and his nobles; but at the same time pitied and resented the comparative insignificance to which their own sovereign had been reduced. The shows and pageantries with which Henry sought to amuse them, did not sooth their feelings, nor silence their murmurs; and these nascent expressions of discontent might have taught him to entertain a doubt of the ultimate result of his enterprise*. But his attention was now called to a more serious subject, the secret malady, which he had for some time affected to despise, but which rapidly undermined his constitution, and baffled the skill of his physicians†. At the invitation of the duke of Burgundy he undertook to raise the siege of Cosne: but the failure of his strength rendered him unable to proceed; and at Corbeil he transferred the command of the army to his brother the duke of Bedford. The dauphin, alarmed at the report of his advance, had retreated across the Loire‡.

From Corbeil Henry was conveyed back to the Bois de Vincennes, where the progress of his disorder soon extinguished every hope of recovery. He met his fate with composure; and divided the short remnant of his time between the concerns of his soul and those of his family. Whatever might be his feelings, he saw the French crown, the great object of his ambition, slip from his grasp without expressing a regret. But for the prosperity of his son he appeared deeply solicitous; the evils of a long and perhaps a tumultuous minority offered themselves to his mind; and his apprehensions and advice, his wishes and commands, were strongly and repeatedly inculcated to the members of his council. On the day of his death he called to his bedside the duke of Bedford, the earl of Warwick, and four other noblemen of distinction. To their loyalty he recommended his wife and her child; and then appointed the earl of Warwick tutor to the prince, the duke of Gloucester guardian of the kingdom. As his last advice he conjured them to cultivate the friendship of the duke of Burgundy, and offer to him the regency of France; but, should he refuse, to give it to his fair brother of Bedford. The issue of the war, he observed, was in the hands of God; but he forbade them, whatever might happen, to release from captivity the French princes of the blood during the minority of his son; or to conclude any peace with the dauphin, unless Normandy were ceded in full sovereignty to the crown of England. Then turning to his physicians, he requested to know how long he might expect to live; and was told, that the Almighty had it in his power to restore him to health. Dissatisfied with the evasion, he repeated his question, and required a direct answer. "Then, sir," replied one of them, falling on his knee, "attend to the health of your soul, for you cannot live more than two hours." He heard the awful denunciation unmoved, sent for his confessor, and devoted the remaining moments to exercises of devotion. While the assistants recited around his bed the penitential psalms, he interrupted them at the verse, "Thou shalt build up the walls of Jerusalem," and said in a faint voice, that it had always been his intention to visit Palestine, and free the holy city from the yoke of the Saracens. He expired in a few hours, on the last day of August in the year 1422*.

The splendour which conquest threw round the person of Henry during his life still adheres to his memory four centuries after his death. But he was not only a warrior, he was also a statesman. The praise of constitutional courage he may share with many of his predecessors: he surpassed most of them in the skill with which he fomented the dissensions among his antagonists, and improved to the best advantage the unexpected events which chequered the busy scene of French politics. Success, however, gave a tinge of arrogance to his character. He did not sufficiently respect the prejudices, or spare the feelings, of his new subjects: the pomp and superiority which he displayed mortified their vanity; and the deference which he exacted from the proudest of the French nobility was reluctantly yielded by men who, under the weak reign of Charles, had been accustomed to trample on the authority of their sovereign. Continually engaged in war, he had little leisure to discharge the duties of a legislator: but he has been commended for his care to enforce the equal administration of justice, and was beloved by the lower classes, both in France and England, for the protection which he afforded them against the oppression of their superiors*. To those who served him, if he were a stern, he was also a bountiful master; and though he punished severely, he rewarded with munificence. By military men he was beloved and adored; and the officers of the army in France resolved to prove the sincerity of that attachment which they had professed for the living monarch, by the extraordinary pomp with which they paid the last duties to his remains.

On the funeral car, and under a rich canopy of silk, was placed a bed of crimson and gold, on which reposed the effigy of the king in his robes, with a crown of gold on the head, the sceptre in the right hand, and the globe and cross in the left. It was preceded and followed by five hundred knights and esquires in black armour, with their spears reversed. Around the corpse walked three hundred torch-bearers, intermixed with persons bearing achievements, banners, and pennons. The clergy of every district, through which the procession passed, were arranged in lines on each side; and behind rode the nobility, the princes of the blood, and the king of Scots as chief mourner. After these, at the distance of a league, followed queen Catherine with a numerous retinue. In this manner the body of the

During Henry's reign the commons obtained from the king a confirmation of their claim, that no statute should be valid unless it were enacted with their assent. They had repeated an ancient complaint, that the terms of their petitions, whether delivered in writing, or by the mouth of the speaker, were frequently so altered by additions, omissions, and pretended corrections, that the law, when it was published, proved to be very different from their original intention. In reply, the king granted, that, "fro thenceforth no thyng should be enacted to the petitions of his comune, that might be contrarie of hyr askyng, wharby they shuld be bound without their assent: savyng alwey to himself his real prerogatif to graunte and denye what him lusted of their petitions and askynges aforesaide†." He soon afterwards gave them another proof of his regard and condescension, by submitting to their inspection and approval the articles of the treaty, which he had concluded with the emperor Sigismund‡. Henry, like his predecessors, was repeatedly obliged to ask for pecuniary aid; but his victories kept the nation in a frenzy of joy; and both houses liberally acceded to his requests.

‡ Ibid. 96. 98. It seems, however, to have become a common practice, in most kingdoms at this period, to have solemn treaties ratified by the three estates.

Though the example of Richard II. had proved the danger of rendering the sovereign independent of parliament, they granted him for life the tonnage and poundage, with the duties upon wool*; and to enable him by loan to anticipate the produce of the taxes, offered the security of parliament to those who refused to advance money on the sole security of the crown†. By these means, and with the tenths granted by the clergy, the king was enabled to raise armies, and carry on a successful war in the heart of France; though, at the same time, if we may believe a statement laid before him by the officers of his treasury, the ordinary revenue of the crown was hardly equal, if it were equal, to the annual expenditure‡.

‡ The receipts of the year ending the 29th of September, 1420, from the customs and duties, amounted to 40,676*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*: from the crown lands, escheats, &c. under the head of casualties, to 15,066*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.*, making the gross sum of 55,743*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* The ordinary expenses for the custody of the marches, the fees of the judges and crown officers, and the annuities granted to different persons, amounted to 52,235*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.*, leaving the small balance of 3,507*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.* But out of that sum provision was to be made for the chambers of the king and queen, their household and wardrobe, the royal works, the navy clerk, the constable of the Tower, and the care of the lions, the guard and support of prisoners, embassies, &c., and an allowance of 100*l.* per month lately granted to the duchess of Brabant. It was moreover observed, that no provision whatever had yet been made for the payment of old debts, among which were numbered those contracted by the king in his prodigal career before he came to the throne. Rym. x. 113, 114. It has, however, been suggested that this statement in Rymer is incorrect; that its deficiency should be supplied from another statement in the Rolls, belonging to the twelfth year of the next reign; and that a sum of 20,000*l.* should be added for the revenue derived from fee-farm rents, from Ireland, Aquitaine, the duchy of Lancaster, &c. I see no cause for the addition. Both statements are divided in the same manner. In the first part is given the revenue belonging to the crown, in the second that derived from parliamentary grants. The chief difference between them is, that the statement in Rymer gives the net amount of the first, after the deduction of all charges upon it: the second contains every particular sum as well as the charges. If it be said that the statement in the Rolls gives something more than 30,000*l.* for the hereditary revenue, while that in Rymer gives only 15,000*l.*—the answer is obvious. The sum of 30,000*l.* after the deduction of the charges upon it, dwindles to about 11,000*l.*; and thus comes as near as could be expected to the amount of the revenue in the time of Henry V. as it is stated in Rymer.

excited considerable interest. He has witnessed its origin at the death of Gregory XI.: after the lapse of almost forty years it still continued to divide and agitate the nations of Europe. The original competitors, Urban and Clement, were indeed dead; but their rival claims had been perpetuated by the zeal or ambition of their partisans; and to Urban had succeeded Boniface IX., Innocent VII., and Gregory XII.; to Clement Peter de Luna, an Arragonese, who, under the name of Benedict XIII., wore the tiara for the long period of thirty years. The evils arising from the conflicting jurisdiction and opposite anathemas of these pontiffs provoked complaints and remonstrances. Consultations were held: princes and prelates united their efforts to put an end to the schism; and a general understanding prevailed, that the two rivals should be induced or compelled to resign, and a new pope should be canonically elected. With this view the church of France withdrew from the obedience of Benedict, whose authority it had previously acknowledged: but, when this example was proposed for imitation by the English prelates, they contented themselves with petitioning the king to withhold from Gregory XII. the monies which the pontiffs annually drew from the kingdom*. At length the cardinals of the two parties united: a council assembled at Pisa; a sentence of deposition was pronounced against both the competitors; and Peter, a Greek, was raised to the papacy by the name of Alexander V. But the remedy added to the evil. Both Gregory and Benedict disputed the authority of the council; and Europe saw for the first time three pontiffs contending for the chair of St. Peter. The restoration of tranquillity was owing to the exertions of the emperor Sigismund, who, by persuasion and menaces, prevailed on John XXIII., the successor of Alexander, to call the council of Constance. In this assembly Gregory resigned; and the refusal of

* Wilk. Con. iii. 206.

John and Benedict to copy his example was followed by a solemn sentence of deposition. To give the greater stability to the election of the new pope, six persons from each of the five nations of Italy, Germany, England, France, and Spain, entered the conclave, and, at the nomination of the bishop of London, the cardinal Colonna was unanimously chosen *. He assumed the name of Martin V. Benedict indeed maintained his pretensions in his native country, but after his death his successor acknowledged the claim of Martin. If the schism was thus terminated, it had previously given a shock to the temporal authority of the pontiffs, from which it never recovered. The contending rivals dared not employ the imperious tone of their predecessors. It was the policy of each to conciliate, to increase the number of his adherents, and to avoid every measure which might drive men to seek the friendship of his opponent. Hence the pretensions which had given so much offence to the sovereigns were allowed to fall into desuetude; enactments, hostile to the immunities or claims of the church, were either passed over in silence, or but feebly opposed; and instead of the spiritual weapons of excommunication and interdict, were adopted the more persuasive means of entreaty and concession.

In England the duration of the schism had allowed the statutes against provisors to be executed with little opposition. Experience, however, showed that they operated in a way which had never been contemplated, to the depression of learning, and the deterioration of the universities. Both these bodies, in the year 1399, presented petitions to the convocation, setting forth, that while the popes were permitted to confer benefices by provision, the preference had always been given to men of talents and industry, who had obtained degrees in the universities; and that the effect of such preference had been to quicken the application, and multiply the number of the students: but that, since the passing of the acts against provisors, their members had been neglected by the patrons, the students had disappeared and the schools were nearly abandoned*.

- A. D. 1416. The evil continued to increase. Sixteen years later it attracted the notice of the commons, who, to preserve the universities from utter destruction, petitioned the king, that the statutes against provisors might be repealed, or an adequate remedy might be provided†. He informed them that he had referred the matter to the bishops. But these prelates had no wish that the statutes should be repealed; and in convocation a law was published, obliging every spiritual patron during the next ten years to bestow the first vacant benefice in his presentation, and after that every second, on some member of either university, graduated in one of the three faculties of divinity, law, or physic. It was hoped that this expedient would silence their complaints; though on account of objections raised by the universities themselves, four years elapsed before it was put in execution‡. The truth is, that the persons who chiefly suffered from the practice of provisions, and who chiefly profited by the statutes against them, were the higher orders of the clergy. These, as their right of presentation was invaded by the exercise of the papal claim, had originally provoked the complaints, which the reader has so frequently noticed, and now were ready to submit to a minor sacrifice, rather than allow the repeal of the statutes which secured to them the influence of patronage, and shielded them from the interference of the pontiffs§.

§ I profit of this open space to notice a singular assertion of Hume at the close of his nineteenth chapter: that "the first commission of array which we meet with was issued by Henry V. in 1415; when the feudal militia gave place to one which was still less orderly and regular." The fact is, that such commissions were usual in every reign since Henry II. See vol. ii. p. 306, and vol. iv. p. 144.

THE French throne was preserved from ruin by the premature death of Henry V. The task of maintaining the ascendancy which he had gained devolved on an infant successor, and a divided ministry; while the dauphin in the vigour of youth, and seconded by the wishes of the people, called the different factions under his banner, and directed their combined efforts against the invaders of their country. We shall see that prince recover in the course of a few years the crown of his ancestors, expel the English from their conquests, and seal a long series of success with the subjugation of Gascony, the last fragment of the ancient patrimony belonging to the English monarchs in France.

The new king, the son of Henry and Catherine, was hardly nine months old. On the first advice of his father's decease, several spiritual and temporal peers, chiefly members of the old council, assembled at Westminster, issued commissions in the name of Henry VI. to the judges, sheriffs, and other officers, to continue in the exercise of their respective duties, and summoned a parliament to meet in the beginning of November. On the previous day a commission to open, conduct, and dissolve the parliament in the king's name, with the consent of the council, was offered by a meeting of peers to the duke of Gloucester. He objected to the words, with the consent of the council, that they were prejudicial to his right, that they made him the servant of the council; and that they had never been introduced into similar commissions under his late brother. It was replied, that the present king was an infant, and therefore without these words or others equivalent, no man could act legally and safely. Each lord in his turn gave this opinion, and the duke was fain to submit*. The parliament was opened by him in the usual form. The first care of that assembly was to ratify all the acts of the authority by which it had been convened, as sufficiently justified by the necessity of the case†; its second, to supply the defect in the exercise of the royal authority arising from the infancy of the king. The two last centuries furnished three instances of minorities; at the accession of Henry III., Edward III., and Richard II. But on none of these occasions had the powers of the executive government been intrusted to a guardian or regent, if we except the two first years of Henry III., when the appointment of such an officer was deemed requisite to oppose the pretensions of a foreign competitor at the head of a powerful army, and in possession of the capital. The duke of Gloucester, however, notwithstanding the decision of the preceding day, preferred a claim to the regency on two grounds; because in the absence of the duke of Bedford he was the nearest of kin to his nephew, and because the late king, when he lay on his death-bed had appointed him to that charge. The lords (for such matters did not appertain to the cognizance of the commons) having searched the Rolls, and consulted the judges, replied; that his demand was not founded either on law or precedent, but was contrary to the constitution of the realm, and the rights of the three estates; and that the appointment of the late king was of no force, because he could not alter the law of the land without the three estates, nor delegate the authority, which expired with his life, to be exercised by another after his death. To satisfy him, however, as far as was in their power, they would appoint him president of the council, in the absence of his brother the duke of Bedford, not with the title of regent, lieutenant, governor, or tutor, words which might be construed to import a delegation of the sovereign authority, but with that of "protector of the realm and church of England;" an appellation which could serve only to remind him of his duty*. Acting on these principles they named the chancellor, Dec. treasurer, and keeper of the privy seal, and sixteen⁵ members of the council with the duke of Bedford, and in his absence, the duke of Gloucester, for president; and by a deputation notified these nominations to the commons, who gave their assent†. Regulations were

 land presented no cause of uneasiness, but every eye was most anxiously turned towards France.

The regency of that kingdom had, according to Henry's last injunctions, been offered to the duke of Burgundy, and on his refusal was given to the duke of Bedford by Oct. Charles, with the advice of his council. But Charles
 22. survived this transaction only a few days; and his death gave to the English interest a shock from which it never recovered. Many of the French nobility had adhered to Henry out of deference to the will of their sovereign; but when this check was removed, their affection, and with it their obedience, reverted to the dauphin, the real representative of their native monarchs.
 That prince was not slow to profit by the event. On the first day after he had received the news of his father's death he wore mourning; on the second he assumed the insignia of royalty with the title of Charles VII.
 king of France. As Rheims was in the possession of his enemies, he was anointed and crowned at Chartres.
 The ceremony operated as a charm, and drew multitudes to his standard †.

On the other side the regent, a prince not inferior to

The bishop of Winchester, when he was chancellor, received the same as an archbishop, and the lord Stafford, as treasurer, the same as an earl (Rot. Parl. v. 404. Rym. x. 268. 359, 360). This difference in the amount seems to have been regulated by the establishment which each was obliged to maintain in proportion to his rank.

* Ibid. iv. 175. After the dissolution of the parliament the judges, by order of the council, separated those acts which regarded the constitution and conduct of the council, and the administration of the royal authority, from the others which had for their object the usual matters of national legislation. Both were to be enrolled in chancery according to custom; but of the first copies were to be made, and lodged with the clerk of the council only: the second were to be put in proper form for proclamation, that they might be published like other statutes. Acts of Council. iii. 22. The fact is, the lords considered the first as matters with which the public had no concern. They would not allow the commons to interfere in these arrangements in parliament; nor did they think it proper to publish the for the information of the people. See the statutes that were published in his late brother in abilities, superior in the more amiable qualities of the heart, did not neglect the interests of his nephew. He obtained from the duke of Burgundy the warmest assurances of support, and prevailed on the duke of Bretagne to signify his approbation of the treaty of Troyes. The three princes met at Arras. They swore to love each other as brothers, to aid each other against the attacks of his enemies, to protect the poor and defenceless against all oppression, and to unite their efforts to remove the scourge of war from the soil of France. To cement this friendship, the dukes of Bedford and Bretagne married each a sister of the duke of Burgundy, and then separated to raise forces in support of the common cause*.

The Loire formed the line of demarcation between the opposite parties. To the south of that river every province, with the exception of Gascony, had espoused the cause of Charles: to the north Anjou and Maine professed to be neutral; and the garrisons of a few insulated fortresses adhered to their native prince: but the rest of the population, with the inhabitants of the capital, acknowledged the authority of the regent. It was not long before the flames of war were rekindled. The country was pillaged by both parties; towns were taken and re-taken; and the fortune of the belligerents was nearly balanced by alternations of defeat and success. The most brilliant event in the campaign was the battle of Crevant on the Yonne. An army of French with the Scottish auxiliaries had formed the siege of that town, and to relieve it four thousand men-at-arms, under the earl of Salisbury, were ordered to join the Burgundians at Auxerre. The regulations for the combined army, before it left that city, are an interesting monument of the military discipline of the age. It was ordered that the soldiers should love and treat each other as brothers; that the vanguard should consist of one hundred and twenty men-at-arms, with the same number of archers taken in equal portions from each nation; that when orders were given to dismount in the presence of the enemy, disobedience should be punished with instant death; that all the horses should be conducted half a league into the rear, and such as were found within that space should be forfeited; that if any man should leave his station in the line he should suffer death; that no prisoners should be made till the victory was certain, under the penalty of the death of the prisoner, and also of the captor, if he offered resistance; that every archer should be furnished with a long pole sharpened at both extremities; and that each man should carry with him provisions for two days*. The enemy occupied an eminence; but were drawn from their advantageous position by the manœuvres of the allies, who dismounting from their horses, and marching on foot in their armour, attempted to make themselves masters of the bridge. For three hours the two armies stood facing each other divided only by the river: at length the English forced their way to the opposite bank, and were followed by the Burgundians. The Scots, who bore the brunt of the battle, were almost annihilated; and the French suffered severely from the garrison, which assaulted them in the rear. The victors entered the place in triumph, carrying with them the French and Scottish commanders, each of whom, after losing an eye in the contest, had been made prisoner†.

This defeat threw a gloom over the prospects of Charles: but it was quickly removed by the arrival of powerful reinforcements from Italy and Scotland. The duke of Milan sent to his assistance a numerous body of Lombards; and the earl Douglas landed in the port of Rochelle with five thousand men. The king, in testimony of his confidence and gratitude, selected his body guard from the Scotch auxiliaries; and, as he had already granted to Stuart of Darnley the French lordships of Aubigny and Concessault, he gave to Douglas the still more valuable dukedom of Tourraine, Mar. 25. which had belonged to himself before his accession. The duke of Albany, the regent of Scotland, and the Scottish nobility, swore in the presence of the French ambassador to maintain the ancient alliance between the two countries, and promised, what it was not in their power to enforce, that their king, in the event of his liberation, should ratify their engagements*. 16. 26.

The necessity of interrupting the harmony between France and Scotland had now become evident; and with this view the English council proposed to king James to treat with him respecting his release from captivity. The offer was joyfully accepted; the Scottish envoys were permitted to join their sovereign; and after much negotiation it was mutually agreed, that the king should be set at liberty, and that in return he should forbid his subjects to enter into the service of France†; should pay by instalments, in six years, the sum of forty thousand pounds, as a compensation for his expenses during the time of his detention‡; and should give hostages as a security till the whole of the money were paid. To attach the Scottish prince more firmly to the interests of England, it was wished to marry him to an English princess; and the ambassadors were instructed to entertain the subject, if it were opened by the Scots, but not to be the first to suggest it, "because, "by the custom of England, it did not become the lady "to be the suitor." It was not, however, necessary to urge the willing mind of James by political motives. His affections were already engaged by a beautiful and accomplished woman, Jane, descended by her father, A. D. 1424. the earl of Somerset, from Edward III., and by her Feb. mother, Margaret Holand, from Edward I. He married Apr. her before his departure; and the protector, to express his satisfaction, remitted, with the consent of the council, a sixth part of the sum stipulated to be paid by the treaty*. The event proved that an English education of nineteen years had not rendered James less fit to wear the crown of Scotland. He proved, as a monarch, a blessing to his country; but though he laboured to fulfil the conditions on which he had been liberated, his revenue had been so impaired by the regents, and his people appeared so unwilling to submit to taxation, that he was never able to discharge one third part of the debt†.

† As James could not enforce the return of the Scots already in France, they were excepted from the benefit of the treaty. Rym. x. 331.

‡ The maintenance of James had been fixed by Henry V. at 700*l.* per annum; which in nineteen years would amount to 13,000*l.* There can be no doubt that of late his expenses had considerably increased. (See Rym. x. 293, 296.) But it is probable that so large a sum was demanded under that pretence, because it could not decently be claimed as a ransom. The English commissioners had private instructions to accept of 36,000, if the Scots objected to 40,000. Id. x. 295.

In France the campaign of the present year was chequered with the same variety of events which marked that of the last. Arthur, brother to the duke of Bretagne, and several Burgundian lords, passed over to the service of Charles; his partisans surprised Compeigne and Crotoi; and the garrison of Ivri, consisting of Bretons, received and unfurled his standard. On the other hand, the duke of Bedford procured a reinforce-

* Rym. x. 323.

† If we may believe Holinshed (p. 587), and Hall (f. 86), James, before his departure, did homage to the young Henry at Windsor, and swore fealty in these words: "I, James Stewart, king of Scotland, shall be true "and faithful unto you, lord Henry, by the grace of God king of England "and France, the noble and superior lord of the kingdom of Scotland, "which I hold and claim of you. And I shall bear you faith and fidelity, " &c." This we are told was done before three dukes, two archbishops, twelve earls, ten bishops, twenty barons, and 200 knights, and yet there can be little doubt that it is a mistake. For in all the public records James is treated not as a vassal but an independent sovereign; and Henry in a private letter styles him:—Rixt heigh and myghty prince by the grace of God kyng of Scotcs. Rym. x. 635.

ment from England, recovered Compeigne and Crotoi, and with two thousand men-at-arms, and seven thousand archers, laid siege to Ivri. A French army of eighteen thousand men, under the duke of Alençon, approached to relieve that fortress; but despairing of success, abandoned it to its fate, and surprised Verneuil. The duke, 17. leaving a garrison to secure his conquest, marched to seek the enemy, who boldly came forward to meet him. The men-at-arms were arrayed in one compact mass: in front and on each flank was stationed a body of archers protected as usual by long stakes fixed in the ground; and in the rear were collected the baggage, servants, and horses of the army, under the protection of two thousand archers; who, to oppose the irruption of the enemy, had tied the horses to each other, both by their bridles and tails, and intermixed them with the carriages in such manner as to form an almost impenetrable rampart. The shock of the two armies is described as dreadful. They fought hand to hand, and with such resolution, that for near an hour neither party seemed to gain any advantage. In the hottest of the battle a body of French and Italian cavalry, instructed to annoy the rear of the English, endeavoured to charge through the horses and baggage; but unable to force their way, or to disentangle themselves, they stood exposed to the arrows of the archers; who, after they had slain or repelled the assailants, turned towards the front, and with a loud shout rushed on the enemy. This manœuvre decided the action. The courage of the French sank; their front was pierced in different points; and the plain was soon covered with fugitives and pursuers. According to the account of the enemy, they lost above three thousand men, the English sixteen hundred. The Scots were so reduced that they never afterwards formed a distinct corps in the French army. The new duke of Touraine, and the earl of Buchan were left on the field: the duke of Alençon, and two hundred gentlemen, were made prisoners. The regent immediately called his officers around him, and returned thanks to God on the field of battle*.

Hitherto the duke of Bedford had supported the honour of the English army, and displayed talents equal to the difficult situation in which he was placed. But in every measure he had the misfortune to be thwarted by the private ambition of his brother the duke of Gloucester. Jacqueline of Bavaria, heiress of Hainault, Holland, Zeeland and Friesland, had for her first husband

A. D. John, dauphin of France. After his death, Henry V.
1417. offered his mediation to compose the difference between April the widow and her uncle, and improved the opportunity
5. to solicit her hand for his brother of Bedford. But Jacqueline, by persuasion of her mother, preferred John,

A. D. duke of Brabant, a boy in his sixteenth year. Their 1418. union was unhappy. He was passionate and capricious ;

she proud and revengeful. The duke dismissed the ladies and servants whom his wife had brought with her from Holland: his favourites in return were soon afterwards massacred in an insurrection of the people. At length she separated from him, repaired to her mother

A. D. at Valenciennes, eloped from Valenciennes, and sought 1421. an asylum in England, where she was received with welcome, July and obtained from the king a pension of £100 a month†. The duke of Gloucester became enamoured with her charms, perhaps still more with her inheritance. But Henry, who saw that a marriage between them would be followed by a rupture with the duke of Burgundy, cousin-german and apparent heir to Jacqueline's husband, restrained the imprudence of his brother, and on his death-bed inculcated with extraordinary earnestness the necessity of making every sacrifice to preserve the friendship of his ally. Gloucester was too headstrong to regard the advice of the king, or to yield to the remonstrances of the council. Maintaining that the marriage of Jacqueline with the duke of Brabant was void, on account of consanguinity, though a dispensation had been obtained from the council of Constance, he married her himself, and immediately laid claim to her dominions. Had her husband been left to his own decision, he might probably have yielded: but the duke of Burgundy espoused his cause, and declared that he would oppose force to force in his behalf. It was in vain that the regent employed all his influence to prevail on his brother to withdraw a demand, which would alienate the Burgundian from the interests of England, and might ultimately throw him into the arms of Charles. As a last resource, in a great council at Paris, it was determined, that the legitimacy of the two marriages should be referred to the pope, and that all parties should await his decision. The duke of Brabant acquiesced: the duke of Gloucester refused. He was already at Calais with Jacqueline and an army of five thousand men, and proceeding into Hainault, immediately obtained possession of the county in right of his pretended wife. The duke of Burgundy on this intelligence sent forces to the aid of his cousin; insulting messages passed between him and Gloucester; a challenge was given and accepted*; and the two combatants agreed to decide their quarrel on the feast of St. George in the presence of the duke of Bedford, the regent. In the interval the Burgundian recalled his forces, and Gloucester prepared to return to England. Notwithstanding the objections of Jacqueline, it was resolved, at the request of the inhabitants, that she should remain at Mons. She parted from the duke with tears, predicting the evils which would result from their separation. The Brabanters renewed the war: the towns of Hainault returned to the obedience of the duke; and Jacqueline was delivered to

* On this occasion the duke of Burgundy paid a high compliment to the duke of Bedford. Si mieux vous plait, he says to his antagonist, je suis content, que nous prenons a juge mon tres cher et aime cousin, et aussi votre beau frere le Regent duc de Bedford—car il est tel prince que je seay, qu'a vous et a moy, et a tous autres il voudroit estre droitier juge. the Burgundians to be detained a captive till the see of Rome should pronounce on the validity of her marriage. The intended duel between the two princes was never fought. In a letter to the duke of Gloucester, the pontiff declared him excommunicated, if he persisted in putting his design in execution; and by a circular brief directed to all the Christian princes in Europe, exhorted them not to permit the combat within their respective dominions. The English parliament, seconding his views, July. recommended that the dowager queens of France and England, with the regent, should take the quarrel into their hands; and in a council held at Paris, it was decided that the challenge had been given without sufficient cause*. In the mean time Jacqueline was conducted by the prince of Orange to Ghent, where she Sept. bore her confinement with impatience, and exerted all 1. her ingenuity to contrive her escape. At length she dressed herself and her female attendant in male attire, mounted a horse, rode unobserved in the dusk of the evening out of one of the gates, and continued her flight till she reached in safety the borders of Holland, where she was joyfully received by her subjects. The Burgundians pursued her thither; and Holland became for two years the theatre of war. The duke of Gloucester sent her five hundred men-at-arms, and was severely reprehended by the council: he renewed the attempt; but was prevented by his brother the regent†. In 1426 the pope is said to have pronounced in favour of the first marriage‡: but the duke of Brabant died soon afterwards, and Jacqueline assumed the title of duchess of Gloucester. The slender aid which she received from England served to defer her submission till 1428, when she was compelled to appoint the duke of Burgundy her

‡ This is said by different writers. If it were true, I know not how the English government could, consistently with the agreement at Paris, continue to acknowledge her for duchess of Gloucester. Yet she is so called in two different instruments in Rymer, dated in 1427 and 1428. Rym. x. 375. 398, and in the address of the commons of 1427. Rot. Parl. iv. 318.

heir, to allow him to garrison her fortresses, and to give her word that she would never marry without his consent *. In the terms of this treaty she virtually acknowledged that she was not the wife of the duke of Gloucester; and yet, only a few weeks before it was concluded, her interests had been espoused in England by a party of females against the neglect of her supposed husband. A lady of the name of Stokes, attended by the wives of A. D. the principal citizens of London, went to the house of 1425. lords, and presented a petition against the duke, accusing him of having neglected his lawful wife, the duchess Jacqueline, and of living in open adultery with Eleanor Cobham †, daughter of Reginald lord Cobham of Sterborough. The beauty of Eleanor was as distinguished as her morals were dissolute. After contributing to the pleasures of different noblemen, she became acquainted with the duke, whose attachment to her was so great, that, even after his union with Jacqueline, he kept her always near his person, and took her with him in his expedition to Hainault ‡. What answer was returned to the petition of these female champions in the cause of conjugal fidelity, is not known: but the duke soon afterwards, to the surprise of Europe, publicly acknowledged Cobham for his wife; and Jacqueline, in breach of her promise to her adversary, married a gentleman called Frank of Bursellen. He was immediately seized by the Burgundians, and his wife, to purchase his liberty, ceded the greater part of her dominions, retaining only an annual rent for her own support. She died Oct. without issue in 1436 §. 8.

Had it not been for this unfortunate attempt of Gloucester to obtain the inheritance of Jacqueline, it was pretended that the party of Charles might have been effectually crushed after the battle of Verneuil. But to defend the duke of Brabant, the duke of Burgundy withdrew his forces from the scene of action, and employed them in Hainault and Holland; and the duke of Bedford, reduced to depend on his own resources, became unable to improve the advantages which he had gained. For three years the war in France was suffered to languish; and the operations on both sides were confined to skirmishes and sieges, unimportant in their consequences to the two parties, but most disastrous to the unfortunate inhabitants. If the regent was inactive through weakness, Charles was equally so through poverty; and if the court of the latter became a scene of intrigue, dissension, and bloodshed, the council of the king of England was not less divided by the jealousy of its members, their quarrels, and their opposite interests*.

Among these the minister who bore the chief sway, both from his situation and relationship to the king, was the duke of Gloucester: but he was often, and sometimes successfully, opposed in his views by Henry Beaufort, the great bishop of Winchester. That prelate was second son to John of Ghent by Catherine Swynford, and was consequently uncle to the regent and his brother, and great-uncle to the king. From the bishopric of Lincoln he had been translated to the more valuable see of Winchester, had thrice borne the high office of chancellor, had assisted at the council of Constance, and had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. His frugality multiplied his riches: but they were rendered subservient to the interests of his country; and his loans to the late monarch amounted to twenty-eight, to the pre-

* The pontiff, as if he had foreseen the evils which followed, had on the succession of the young Henry written to the council, recommending to them above all things to live in harmony with each other, as the best means of preserving the dominions of their infant sovereign. Ad regnum hoc in rerum statu salubriter dirigendum nulla res est tantum necessaria, quantum est vestra concordia, qui reipublice præsidentis; vobis enim habentibus unam mentem, una voluntate regentibus, nulla accidere calamitas potest. Apud Raynald. vi. 51

 He had again accepted the office of chancellor, and in that situation had strenuously opposed Gloucester's favourite plan of claiming the inheritance of Jacqueline. July 16.
 During the absence of that prince, the council, under the influence of the prelate, and with a view to repress the mutinous disposition of the populace, had garrisoned the Tower, and committed it to the care of Richard Wydevile, with orders "to admit no one more powerful than himself." When Gloucester returned, he demanded lodgings in that fortress, and attributed the refusal of Wydevile to the secret instructions of his uncle. In his resentment he ordered the mayor to close the gates of the city against the bishop, and to furnish him with five hundred horsemen, that he might visit in safety the young king at Eltham. The next morning the retainers of Beaufort attempted to burst open the gate on the bridge, barricaded the road, placed archers in the houses on each side, and declared that, as their lord was excluded from entering the city, so they would prevent the duke from leaving it †. It cost the archbishop of Canterbury and the duke of Coimbra, second son of the king of Portugal by Philippa, the sister of the late monarch, eight journeys in the same day from party to party, to prevent the effusion of blood, and to induce them to keep the peace, till the return of the duke of Bedford ‡. With reluctance the regent left Paris, landed in England (Dec. 20), and summoned a parliament at Leicester. It was, however, his hope that a reconciliation between his brother and uncle might be effected before that meeting. With this view the archbishop and

‡ The bishop wrote on the 30th of October to the regent, requesting his immediate return: "for," he adds, "by my troth, and ye tarry long, we shall put this land in jeopardy with a field, such a brother ye have here: "God make him a good man!" They entered the city of London together. Bedford appears to have favoured his uncle, and to have blamed his brother. When the citizens made him a present of 1000 marks in two basins of silver gilt, he hardly thanked them. Fabian, 414, 415.

A. D. 1426. several lords waited on Gloucester, and requested him on the part of the king to attend the council at Northampton. They were instructed to represent to him that he could have no reasonable objection to meet his uncle on such an occasion; that measures would be taken to prevent any affray between their followers; that the bishop, as the accused party, had a right to be confronted with his accuser, and that the king could not be expected to deprive him of office before the charge against him had been proved. But the duke's obstinacy was not to be subdued by argument, and he received a royal order to attend in his place at the approaching parliament*.

Jan. 29. There the commons, by their speaker, conjured the regent and the lords to reconcile the duke of Gloucester with the bishop of Winchester. The former had preferred a bill of impeachment against his uncle, in which to his own grievances he added two charges, which, if we may believe him, he had received from his brother, the late king; the first, that the prelate had hired an assassin to take Henry's life while he was yet prince of Wales; the second that he had exhorted him to usurp the crown during the life of his father. In his answer, Beaufort endeavoured to show that, if he had given personal offence to the duke, yet his conduct was justified by the behaviour of that prince; and to the charges said to have been made by Henry V., he opposed the confidence and employments with which that king had honoured the man, who was now accused of having attempted his life. The duke of Bedford and the other lords took an oath to judge with impartiality: but in what manner the trial proceeded we are not informed. Three days later the duke and bishop consented to leave their quarrel to the decision of the primate and eight other arbitrators, by whose award the following farce was enacted. Beaufort began by addressing the king, to whom he protested ^{Mar.} his innocence of the charges which respected Henry ^{12.} V.; and the duke of Bedford replied, in the name of the infant sovereign, that the king had no doubt of the innocence of his great-uncle, and held him to have ever been a true man to the late monarch both before and after his succession to the throne. Then turning to the duke of Gloucester, the bishop expressed his sorrow that his nephew should have conceived any displeasure against him: "but, sir," he continued, "I take God to witness, that what reports soever have been made unto you of me, (peradventure by such as have not had great affection unto me: God forgive them!) I never imagined nor purposed thing that might be hindering or prejudice to your person, honour, or estate; and for so much I pray you that you will be unto me good lord from this time forth; for by my will I gave you never other occasion, nor purpose not to do hereafter through God's grace." The duke replied: "Fair uncle, since you so declare you such a man as you say, I am right glad that it is so, and for such I take you." Each then took the other by the hand, and the ceremony was finished. Such a reconciliation could not be real; and the bishop, whether it were his own resolve, or had been previously stipulated, resigned the seals the next day, and soon afterwards requested permission to travel. He ^{May} remained however in England till the beginning of the ^{12.} following year, when he accompanied his nephew, the duke of Bedford, to Calais. There he received the welcome intelligence that he had been named a cardinal by ^{A. D.} pope Martin, and was invested with the insignia of his ^{1427.} dignity in the presence of the regent and a numerous ^{Mar.} court ^{25.}.

There is reason to believe that this quarrel between the uncle and nephew originated in the jealousy which Beaufort entertained of the ambition of the duke, who

on many occasions had acted as if he were independent of the council, and to their remonstrances had replied, that he would be accountable to no man but the king; when he should come of age. Even of late he had said, "Let my brother govern as him lusteth, whiles he is in this land: after his going over into France, I woll govern as me seemeth good." On this account the other members sent for the duke of Bedford to the star-chamber, a few days before his departure, and the next morning waited in a body on the duke of Gloucester, who was confined by sickness to his "inne." To both the chancellor made a similar address, stating that the young prince was the rightful king of England, and entitled to the obedience of all his subjects, of whatever rank they might be; that young as he was, he yet possessed by law all the authority which would belong to him at a more mature age; that, as during his infancy he could not exercise such authority, it was vested in the lords spiritual and temporal assembled in parliament, or in the great council, and, at other times, in the lords appointed to form the "continual council;" and that this council, representing the king's person, had a right to exercise the powers of government, "withouten that any one person may or ought to ascribe to himself the said rule and government." They concluded by begging the two dukes to inform them, whether they held the same sentiments. Both replied (and subscribed their replies with their own signatures) that they cheerfully assented to the principles which had been laid down, and that "in all things that belonged to the rule of the land and the observances of the king's laws, and to his estate, they would be advised, demeaned, and ruled by the lords of the council, and obey unto the king, and to them as for the king, as lowly as the least and poorest of his subjects." It should, however, be observed, that the answer of the duke of Bedford was much more full and submissive than that of his brother; and that taking up the book of the Gospels, he solemnly swore to observe through life the promise which he then made. Gloucester did not swear*.

It was the sense of his own weakness which had induced the duke of Bretagne to join the confederacy in 1423. But no sooner did he observe the seeds of dissension sown between the dukes of Burgundy and Gloucester than he lent a more willing ear to the counsels of his brother Arthur, who had recently been appointed by the dauphin constable of France. Under different pretences, his troops were gradually withdrawn from the armies of the allies; men for the service of Charles were enrolled within his territories; and he had made, or was said to have made, a secret promise of open co-operation, as soon as the duke of Burgundy should break the alliance with England. The regent resolved to anticipate his intended treachery, and prevailed on the English council to declare war against him in the beginning of 1426†. Jan. 15. Immediately troops from the garrisons of Normandy were poured into Bretagne; the natives were defeated in several engagements; and the flames of war were spread to the very walls of Rennes. The duke in despair solicited and obtained an armistice; his apologies and offers were rejected, he tried again the fortune of war, was again unsuccessful, and at last submitted to the terms dictated by the regent. By an instrument under his seal, and those of his sons, barons, prelates, and the commonalties of his duchy, he acknowledged Henry for his rightful sovereign, and promised upon oath to observe the treaty of Troyes, to obey the commands of the regent, and to do homage for his territories to the king of England, and to no other person‡.

Five years had now elapsed since the death of the late monarch; and, if no addition had been made to his conquests, at least no considerable loss had been experienced. But at length, in an evil hour, it was determined to cross the Loire, and to attack Charles in the provinces which had always adhered to his cause. With this view several councils were held at Paris: the regent yielded, it is said, with regret, to the majority of voices; and a resolution was taken to open the campaign with the reduction of Orleans§.

* Rot. Parl. v. 408—411. Acts of Coun. iii. 231—242. † Rym. x. 349. Acts of Coun. iii. 181. ‡ Rym. x. 378, 385. § In his letter to the king, the regent

Montague, earl of Salisbury, had lately returned from England with a reinforcement of six thousand men. After the earl of Warwick, he was the most renowned of the English commanders; and to him by common consent was intrusted the conduct of the siege. On the part of the French no preparation was omitted, no sacrifice was spared, to preserve the city, and annoy the aggressors. The garrison received a plentiful supply of ammunition and provisions; numerous batteries were erected on the walls; and every building within the range of the cannon was levelled to the ground.

- Oct. 12. The earl having previously reduced several places in the neighbourhood, passed the Loire with ten thousand men, and established his head-quarters on the left bank amid the ruins of a convent. His first operations were directed against the Tournelles, a castle which defended the passage of the bridge. It was carried by assault: but the garrison had previously broken down one of the arches, and had built an additional work at the other extremity. A few days afterwards, as the English commander stood at a window in one of the towers of the fort, and was carefully examining the defences of the city, a shot was fired at him from the rampart. He saw the flash and attempted to withdraw; but the ball tore away the iron of the casement, and so lacerated his face, that he died in the course of the next week*. The command devolved on the earl of Suffolk, who received several reinforcements, and successively established his men in different posts round the city. They were lodged in huts, and covered from the fire of the besieged by intrenchments of earth. But the walls were of such extent, and the intervals between these posts, which were called bastiles, were so spacious, that often in the night supplies of men and provisions forced their way into the place ; for which purpose Charles had established immense magazines in the neighbouring city of Blois*.

The siege, or rather blockade, continued during the winter. In the beginning of Lent sir John Falstaff left Paris with fifteen hundred men, to conduct to Orleans four hundred waggons and carts, laden with stores and provisions. He had almost reached the village of Rouvrai en Beausse, when he received the alarming intelligence ^{A. D.} that the earl of Claremont was advancing to intercept ¹⁴²⁹ him with from four to five thousand cavalry. He halted ^{Feb.} immediately, surrounded his little army with a circle of ^{12.} carriages, and left but two openings, at each of which he posted a strong body of archers. It was the middle of the night ; and for two hours the attack of the enemy was delayed by the disputes among their leaders. Sir John Stuart, who commanded the small remnant of the Scots in the service of Charles, earnestly contended that the men-at-arms should dismount : the earl of Claremont, by the advice of his countrymen, preferred to charge on horseback. At three in the morning it was agreed that each nation should follow its own judgment. An attempt was made to force an entrance at each opening ; but the cavalry were repulsed by showers of arrows, and the Scots on foot were all slain. About six hundred dead bodies were left on the field ; and Falstaff continued his march in triumph to the camp before Orleans †. In the spring the English resumed their operations : lines of communication were drawn from one bastile to another ; and the besieged, seeing themselves invested on all sides, proposed, with the permission of Charles, to deliver the city into the hands of the duke of Burgundy, to be held by him as neutral during the war, for the benefit of the duke of Orleans, a captive in England.

† In the quaint language of the times, this was called " the battle of "Jerrings:" because salt herrings formed a great portion of the provisions. Monstrel. ii. 42.

The regent refused the offer. It was but just, he said, that what had been won with English blood, should be the reward of English valour. In this determination the Burgundian acquiesced with apparent cheerfulness; but the refusal sank deep into his heart; nor was it forgotten on a subsequent occasion.

The fall of Orleans was now confidently anticipated; and the most gloomy apprehensions prevailed in the councils of the French monarch. Many of those who had been the warmest in their professions of attachment silently withdrew from his court; and the prince himself meditated a retreat into the distant county of Provence, perhaps into the friendly kingdom of Scotland, when the French throne was saved from ruin by the daughter of a small farmer at Domremy, a hamlet in Champagne, situate between Neuchateau and Vaucouleurs. The wonderful revolution which she accomplished, by means apparently supernatural, will justify an endeavour to trace the origin and progress of the enthusiasm which, while it deluded, yet nerved and elevated the mind of this young and interesting female*.

Joan d'Arc was born about the year 1412. Her education did not differ from that of the other poor girls in the neighbourhood: but she was distinguished above them all by her diligence, modesty and piety. Domremy, like other villages, had its traditional tales of wonder and supernatural agency. There stood at no great distance an old spreading beech-tree, under the branches of which the fairies were said to hold their nocturnal meetings; near its foot ran a clear streamlet, the waters of which were believed to work astonishing cures; and a little farther off was a still more sacred spot, a solitary chapel called the Hermitage of the Virgin. Joan was accustomed to visit all these places with her companions. But the hermitage was her favourite resort, where every Saturday she hung up a garland of flowers, or burnt a taper of wax in honour of the mother of Christ. These her early habits are worthy of notice, as they probably served to impress on her mind that credulous and romantic character which it afterwards exhibited. The child was fond of solitude: whatever interested her, became the subject of long and serious thought; and in these day dreams the young enthusiast learned to invest with visible forms the creations of her own fancy. She was but twelve years old, when, walking in her father's garden on a Sunday, she thought that she observed a brilliant light on one side, and heard a voice calling on her by her name. She turned, and saw, as she believed, the archangel Michael, who told her to be good, dutiful, and virtuous, and God would protect her. She felt abashed in his presence, but at his departure wept, wishing that he had taken her with him. A. D.

Besides religion there was another sentiment, which sprung up in the breast of Joan. Young as she was, she had heard enough of the calamities which oppressed her country, to abhor the unnatural union of the Burgundians with the English, and to bewail the hard fate of her natural sovereign, driven by rebels and strangers from the throne of his fathers. The inhabitants of Domremy were royalists; those of the neighbouring village of Marçay, Burgundians: the two parties frequently met, quarrelled and fought; and these petty feuds served to rivet the attention of the girl on this most exciting subject. At length arrived the news of the disastrous battle of Verneuil. She witnessed the despair of her parents and neighbours; and learned from them, that there remained but one source of hope for her country, the possible accomplishment of a traditional prophecy, that from Bois-chesnu, the adjoining forest of oaks, would come a maid, destined to be the saviour of France. Aug.

Such a prediction was likely to make a deep impression on the mind of Joan. One day, when she was alone, tending her father's flock, she again heard the voice, and saw the form of the archangel: but he was now accompanied by two females, the saints Catherine and Margaret, names, it should be observed, familiar to her, for they were the patronesses of the parish church. He announced to her that she was the woman pointed out by the prophecy; that hers was the important commission to conduct her sovereign to Rheims preparatory to his coronation; that with this view she ought to apply to Baudricourt, governor of Vaucouleurs, for the means of access to the royal presence; and that Catherine and Margaret would accompany her as guides and monitors, whom it was her duty to obey. It is plain that the enthusiast mistook for realities the workings of her own imagination. Even she herself, in her more sober moments, was appalled at the idea of so extraordinary a mission, and her confidence was shaken by the incredulity and disapprobation of her parents. But "her voices," as she called them, reiterated the command: they reprimanded her for her disobedience; and she began to fear that any longer delay might be a sin, which would endanger her salvation.

May.

It chanced that a marauding party of Burgundians compelled the inhabitants of Domremy to seek an asylum in Neufchateau. The village was plundered, and the church reduced to a heap of ruins. On their departure the fugitives returned, and the sight wound up the enthusiasm of Joan to the highest pitch. She escaped from her parents, prevailed on an uncle to accompany her, and announced her mission to Baudricourt. Though he treated her with ridicule, she was not discouraged, but remained at Vaucouleurs, where her pretensions gradually transpired, and made her the object of public curiosity. The duke of Lorraine,* who laboured under an incurable disease, applied to her as a woman possessed of supernatural powers; but she answered with her characteristic simplicity, that she had no mission to him: he had never been named to her by "her voices."

At length the governor, who had deemed it his duty ^{A.D.} to communicate her history to the dauphin, received ^{1429.} an order to forward her to the French court. To pene-^{Feb.}trate from Vaucouleurs on the eastern border of Champagne to Chinon in Tourraine, a distance of one hundred and fifty leagues, through a long tract of country, of which one portion was possessed by hostile garrisons, and the other perpetually infested by parties of plunderers, was a perilous and almost hopeless attempt. But ^{Feb.}Joan was confident of success. On horseback, and in 19. male attire, with an escort of seven persons*, she passed without meeting an enemy; and on the tenth day at ^{Feb.}Fierbois, a few miles from Chinon, announced to Charles ^{28.} her arrival and object. That she should have come safe, was thought miraculous: yet two days were spent in deliberation: she might be, it was wisely contended, an emissary of the devil; and to elucidate this important question, a commission was appointed to receive her answers to certain interrogatories. The report proved favourable: after much delay and vacillation, an hour was fixed for her admission to the royal presence; and the poor maiden of Domremy was ushered into a spacious hall, lighted up with fifty torches, and filled with some hundreds of knights, among whom Charles himself had mixed unnoticed, and in plain attire. Joan entered without embarrassment: the glare of the lights, the gaze of the spectators did not disconcert her. Singling out the dauphin at the first glance, she walked up to him with a firm step, bent her knee, and said, "God "give you good life, gentle king." He was surprised, but replied: "I am not the king, he is there," pointing at the same time to a different part of the hall. "In "the name of God," she exclaimed, "it is not they,

"but you are the king. Most noble lord dauphin, "I am Joan the maid, sent on the part of God to aid you and the kingdom, and by his order I announce "to you that you will be crowned in the city of "Rheims *." Charles took her aside; spent some time with her in earnest conversation, and, rejoining the company, affirmed that she had discovered to him secrets of his own, which could not have been communicated to her by agency merely human. The following day, "the maid" (so she was now called) made her appearance in public and on horseback. From her look she was thought to be in her sixteenth or seventeenth year; her figure was slender and graceful, and her long black locks fell in ringlets on her shoulders. She ran a course with the lance, and managed her horse with ease and dexterity. The crowd burst into shouts of admiration: they saw in her something more than human; she was a knight descended from heaven for the salvation of France †.

Had the pretensions of "the maid" been a political artifice to raise the desponding spirits of his followers, Charles would have seized the present moment to lead them against the enemy. But opposite opinions divided his council. Many, instead of seeking to avail themselves of the public delusion, were afraid of being deluded themselves. She was said to be sent to them from heaven: but was it not possible that she might be an imp from hell? To elucidate this grave and obscure question, Joan was examined and re-examined by a committee of theologians, by the parliament of Poitiers, and by the whole body of the privy councillors; and three weeks elapsed before the king would consent to acknowledge her in her supernatural character. That interval she spent in seclusion and prayer; and then was exhibited a second time to the multitude, sitting on a grey charger with her banner borne before her, and armed at all points as a knight. The air resounded with acclamations: men of every rank caught the enthusiasm; and thousands offered their services to follow her to battle. She herself was eager to prove in action the truth of her pretensions: but the king checked her impetuosity, and coolly watched the effect of her presence both on the English as well as on his own subjects.

Care had been taken that the history of "the maid" should be communicated with due exaggeration to the besieging army before Orleans. At first it was received with scorn and derision; soon it began to make impression on the more credulous: from them the alarm was gradually communicated to their neighbours; and at last men of the stoutest hearts shrunk from the task of encountering a supernatural though female champion. It was in vain that Suffolk and his officers sought to check and subdue this dangerous feeling. If they called her an impostor, appeal was made to the wonders attributed to her by report: if a sorceress, the men replied that they feared no mortal like themselves, but were not a match for the spirits of darkness.

Sixty bastiles or forts, erected in a circle round Orleans, had effectually intercepted the communication with the country; and the horrors of famine were already felt within the walls, when it was resolved by the French cabinet to make a desperate effort to throw a supply of provisions into the city. A strong body of men, under some of the bravest officers in France, assembled at Blois, and "the maid" solicited and obtained permission not only to join, but also to direct, the expedition. She was received as an envoy from heaven, and began the exercise of her supernatural authority by expelling all women of loose character from the army, and calling on the men to prepare for combat by exercises of devotion. To Suffolk, Glasdale and Pole, the English commanders, she sent orders in the name of God to withdraw from France, and return to their native country: to the chiefs of her own nation she promised complete success, if they would cross the Loire, and march boldly through La Beauce and the quarters of the enemy. But they were not disposed to sacrifice their own plans to the suggestions of an inexperienced enthusiast. Dunois, the governor of Orleans, taking April 29. advantage of her ignorance of the country, proceeded by la Sologne on the left bank, and, prevailing on her to cross the river with him in a boat, led her secretly into Orleans, where she was received by the citizens with lighted torches and acclamations of joy. The relieving party had also embarked in boats, and endeavoured to reach Orleans by water: but the wind and current forced them back: they landed, crossed by the bridge at Blois, and were thus compelled to pursue the route previously pointed out by "the maid." Her promise, however, or prediction was verified. The besiegers did not stir from their entrenchments, and the convoy entered the city.

From this moment it became dangerous to dispute the celestial mission of Joan. Her presence created in the soldiers a spirit of daring and a confidence of success, which might perhaps be guided, but could not be restrained by the authority of their leaders. Day after day sallies were made, and the strongest of the May 4. English forts, the bastiles of St. Loup, and St. Jean le blanc, and Augustus, and les Tournelles, successively 6. fell into the hands of the assailants. On every occasion 7. "the maid" was to be seen in the foremost rank, with her banner displayed, and encouraging her countrymen by her voice and gestures: but at the storming of the Tournelles, whilst she was in the act of planting the first ladder against the wall, an arrow passed through an opening in her corslet, and fixed itself between the chest and the shoulder. Her companions conveyed her out of the crowd; the wound was dressed; and the heroine, after a few minutes spent in prayer, rejoined the combatants. At her appearance the assailants redoubled their efforts, and the fort was won.

Suffolk, disconcerted by these repeated losses, and warned by the desponding countenances of his followers, called in the night a council of war, and determined to raise the siege. At dawn the English army was seen May at a short distance from the walls, drawn up in battle array, and braving the enemy to fight in the open field; but "the maid" forbade any man to pass the gates of the city. It was Sunday, she said, a day to be spent in prayer and not in battle. Suffolk waited some hours in vain: at length he gave the signal: the long line of forts, the fruit of so many months' labour, was instantly in flames; and the soldiers, with feelings of shame and regret, turned their backs to the city. The authority of Joan prevented any pursuit*, and Suffolk having distributed his men in the neighbouring fortresses, informed the regent that he should be able to maintain his position till the arrival of reinforcements from Paris.

But it was not the intention of Charles to allow his enemies the leisure to breathe. The earl of Suffolk was June soon besieged in Jargeau, and the place on the tenth 12. day was carried by storm. The Maid of Orleans (she had now received this addition to her former appellation) led the assailants, and reached the top of the wall, from which, by a stroke on the head, she was precipitated into the ditch. As she lay, unable to rise, she continued to exhort her friends with her voice. "Forward, country-men," she exclaimed, "fear nothing: the Lord has delivered them into our hands." During the assault an unguarded corner had been discovered; the French poured into the place; more than three hundred of the garrison perished; and Suffolk with the remainder fell into the hands of the enemy. Of the officer, who demanded his sword, he inquired if he were a knight; and being answered in the negative, "Then," said he, "I will make thee one." Having knighted him, he surrendered. Mehun, Baugency, and other fortresses, experienced the same fate as Jargeau; and the lord Talbot, who had succeeded to the command, retired towards Paris, till he received a reinforcement of four thousand men. He halted at Patay: but the enemy advanced to the town; and the time for preparation was lost in unavailing debate. Sir John Falstaff proposed to retreat with expedition: Talbot refused to show his back to the enemy. He dismounted, and after a sharp action was made prisoner, with the loss of twelve hundred men. Falstaff fled in the beginning of the action; and in punishment of his cowardice was condemned to forfeit the garter. He proved, however, to the satisfaction of the regent, that to fight with men so dispirited as were the soldiers at Patay, was not to avoid disgrace, but to invite defeat. His excuse was admitted, and he recovered his former honours.

Joan had always declared that the object of her mission was twofold, the liberation of Orleans, and the coronation of the king at Rheims. Of these the first had been accomplished, and she vehemently urged the execution of the second. Though to penetrate as far as Rheims was an enterprise of difficulty and danger, though every intermediate fortress was in the possession of the English or the Burgundians, Charles determined to trust to his own fortune and the predictions of his inspired deliverer. Having sent a strong division of troops to alarm the frontiers of Normandy, and another to insult those of Guienne, he commenced his march with an army of ten thousand cavalry. At Auxerre the citizens refused to admit him within their walls; but they supplied him with provisions, and engaged to imitate the conduct of the other cities. Those of Troyes, after a debate of four days, opened their gates. The inhabitants of Chalons spontaneously sent him the keys of the town; and the citizens of Rheims, having expelled the Burgundian garrison, received him with the most flattering testimonies of joy*. The coronation was performed in the usual manner: but as none of the peers of France attended, Charles appointed proxies to perform their duties. During the ceremony, the maid, with her banner unfurled, stood by the king's side: as soon as it was over, she threw herself on her knees, embraced his feet, declared her mission accomplished, and with tears solicited his leave to return to her former station. But the king was unwilling to lose the services of one who had hitherto proved so useful; and at his earnest request she consented to remain with the army, and to strengthen that throne, which she had in a great measure established. This unexpected revolution in the relative situation of the two parties, while it afflicted the duke of Bedford, stimulated him to new exertions. He obtained fresh assurances of fidelity from the duke of Burgundy, withdrew five thousand men from his Norman garrisons, and received an equal number from his uncle Beaufort, who had raised a small army for the chimerical purpose of suppressing the Bohemian Hussites†. With these he went in pursuit of Charles, who, unwilling to stake his crown on the uncertain event of a battle, avoided him with equal industry. Weary of this useless labour, he wrote to the king a letter, in which he charged him with deluding the people with the impostures of a dissolute woman, and the sermons of an apostate friar; required him like a loyal prince to name a day and a place where they might meet in the county of Brie; promised that, if a stable peace could be made with a man who had violated his word to the late duke of Burgundy, and stained himself with innocent blood, he would condescend to reasonable conditions; and if not,

he offered to fight him hand to hand, that from the issue of the combat the world might know whose claim was favoured by Heaven. To so uncourteous a message Charles did not vouchsafe an answer: but what the duke could not effect, was brought about by accident; and in the neighbourhood of Senlis the two armies undesignedly came in sight of each other. The English, inferior in number, prepared for the fight after their usual manner: the French officers, flushed with success, impatiently demanded the signal of battle. But the defeats of Azincourt and Verneuil had taught Charles not to rely on mere superiority of number. He consulted the maid: her inspiration had deserted her since the expedition to Rheims. Sometimes she advised, at others dissuaded an engagement: two days were passed in deliberation; and on the third, after a few sharp skirmishes, the armies separated as if it had been by mutual consent. The regent hastened into Normandy, and repulsed the constable, who had penetrated into that duchy; and Charles, at the solicitation of his female champion, took advantage of the duke's absence to make an attempt on the capital. Soissons, Senlis, Beauvais, and St. Denis opened their gates.

He advanced to Montmartre, published an amnesty, and directed an assault on the fauxbourg of St. Honoré. The action lasted four hours. At its very commencement Joan received a dangerous wound, was thrown into the ditch, and lay there unnoticed, till she was discovered in the evening and carried off by a party sent to search after her. Charles, mortified by the obstinate resistance of the Parisians, retired to Bourges; whilst the maid, looking on her wound as an admonition from Heaven that her commission had ceased with the coronation at Rheims, consecrated her armour to God in the church of St. Denis. Her services, however, were still wanted. At the solicitation of her sovereign she consented to resume the profession of arms, and accepted a patent of nobility for herself and her family, Det. accompanied with a grant of income equal to that of an 29. earl*.

While the severity of the weather suspended the operations of war, both parties endeavoured to strengthen themselves by means of negotiation. It was more than suspected that the duke of Burgundy began to repent of his alliance with England; and his fidelity was tempted by an honourable embassy from Charles, who offered him every reasonable satisfaction for the murder of his father. By the majority of his council the proposal was cheerfully received: but the influence of his sister, the duchess of Bedford, fixed the wavering sentiments of her brother; and the duke, in consideration of the payment of twenty-five thousand nobles, engaged ^{A. D.} to assume the command of the united army at the com- ^{1430.} mencement of spring. He undertook to reduce the city of Compeigne; and the maid was selected to raise the siege. On her march she met an inferior force of Burgundians, defeated it after an obstinate resistance, and ordered its commander, Franquet, to be beheaded on the spot†. On the very evening of her arrival she ^{May} surprised the post of Marigni: but reinforcements ^{25.} poured in from every quarter, and in a short time the assailants turned their backs. The heroine immediately took the command of the rear-guard, and repeatedly facing about, repulsed the pursuers. At last, however, her men were broken; an archer pulled her from her horse; and, as she lay on the ground, she surrendered to the bastard of Vendôme. The shouts of the allied army announced to the besieged the fate of their heroine, who was conducted to the quarters of John of Luxembourg, and after some months was sold by him to the regent. Though the garrison was grieved, it was not dismayed by this accident; and the place defied the power of the enemy, till the siege was raised by the approach of the French army under the marshal de Boussac*.

The unfortunate maid was treated with neglect by her friends, with cruelty by her enemies. If ever prince had been indebted to a subject, Charles VII. was indebted to Joan d'Arc. She had dispelled the terror with which success had invested the English arms, had re-animated the courage of the French soldiery, and had firmly established the king on the throne of his ancestors. Yet, from the moment of her captivity she appears to have been forgotten. We read not of any sum offered for her ransom, or attempt made to alleviate the rigour of her confinement, or notice taken of her trial and execution. Her enthusiasm had produced the promised effect; and when it was no longer wanted, the jealousy of the French commanders was not displeased at the removal of a female and plebeian rival.

By the humanity of later ages, the life of the prisoner of war is considered as sacred: a few centuries ago he remained at the mercy of the captor, who might retain him in custody, liberate him for money, or put him to death†. Avarice, however, generally prevailed over cruelty or resentment; and the wealth to be obtained from the ransom of prisoners was one of the most powerful inducements to military service. Yet, even the present war had furnished several instances, in which captives, distinguished for their ferocity or obstinacy, had suffered death; and the recent execution of the celebrated Burgundian leader, Franquet, made it doubtful whether the maid herself did not approve of the practice. Had, therefore, her enemies dealt with her in the same manner, though her partisans might have lamented her fate, they could not have charged them with injustice*: but the bishop of Beauvais, in whose diocese she had been taken, claimed the right of trying her in his court on an accusation of sorcery and imposture†. It is generally supposed that this claim was made at the suggestion of the duke of Bedford, who trusted that the general belief of her supernatural mission would yield to the condemnation of an ecclesiastical tribunal. That he considered her an agent of the devil, is evident from one of his own letters‡: and the history of her trial shows that the same opinion had been imbibed by the credulity of her judges. The inquiry was opened at Rouen: on sixteen different days she was brought to the bar; the questions with her answers, were laid before the university of Paris; and the opinion of that body concurred with the judgment of the court. Still the sentence was delayed from day to day; and repeated attempts were made to save her from the punishment of death, by inducing her to make a frank and explicit confession. But the spirit of the heroine continued undaunted: she proudly maintained that she had been the inspired minister of the Almighty; and repeated her conviction that she was often favoured with visits from the archangel Michael, and the saints Margaret and Catherine. The fatal day, however, arrived, and the captive was placed at the bar: but, when the judge had prepared to pronounce sentence, she yielded to a sudden impulse of terror, subscribed an act of abjuration, and, having promised upon oath never more to wear male attire, was remanded to her former place of confinement. Her enthusiasm, however, revived in the solitude of a prison; her cell was again peopled with celestial visitants, and new scenes of military glory opened to her imagination. An impartial observer would have pitied and respected the mental delusion with which she was afflicted: the credulity of her judges condemned her, on the charge of having relapsed into her former errors. She was led sobbing and struggling to the stake: nor did the expectation of a heavenly deliverer forsake her, till she saw the fire kindled at her feet. She then burst into loud exclamations, protesting her innocence, and invoking the aid of the Almighty; and just before the flames enveloped her, was seen embracing a crucifix, and calling on Christ for mercy. This cruel and unjustifiable tragedy was acted in the market-place of Rouen, before an immense concourse of spectators, about twelve months after her capture*.

According to the general persuasion of the age, the ceremony of coronation was believed to consecrate the person, and confirm the right of the sovereign. No sooner had Charles been crowned at Rheims, than the duke of Bedford determined that his nephew should be also crowned at the same place. The young king, as a preparatory step, received the regal unction at Westminster in his eighth year; from which moment the title of protector was suppressed, and that of prime counsellor only retained†. But the poverty of the ex-

tenant during his absence. He proceeded to Rouen: May but the prospect of penetrating to Rheims grew fainter every day; and at the end of eighteen months it was determined that the coronation should take place in Paris. In November, 1431, attended by the chief of the English nobility, and three thousand horse, he left Pontoise, and was met on the road by the clergy, the parliament, the magistrates, and the citizens of the capital. Triumphal arches had been erected: mysteries were performed, and devices were exhibited to honour and entertain the young king. But under these public demonstrations of joy, the Parisians could with difficulty conceal their forebodings of subsequent calamities. The coronation of Henry bore but little resemblance to the coronation of their native monarchs. The ceremony was performed by an English prelate, the cardinal of Winchester; the high offices of state were filled by foreigners, or by natives of inferior rank; and no prince of the blood royal of France, not one of the lay peers, Dec. not even the duke of Burgundy attended to grace the 17. court of the new king. During the king's absence in France the duke of Gloucester had displayed his zeal for religion and the public tranquillity, by the suppression of riots and insurrections in several counties, occasioned by the circulation of seditious handbills, and the spread of the Lollard doctrine, that priests ought not to be "possessioners," and that among Christians all things ought to be in common. He spent the summer in moving from place to place, attended by one of the judges, and inflicting the penalty of death on the guilty: but it appears that his loyalty and religion were inspired and invigorated A. The war languished during the two following years. Its duration had impoverished and exhausted both parties: but, if they were unable through weakness to act with vigour, they were equally unwilling through pride to put an end to the contest. In 1432 happened an event which inclined the balance in favour of Charles. The duchess of Bedford, whose influence with her husband and brother had kept together the discordant materials of which the confederacy was composed, died in November; and the precipitate union of the regent officials friends were not wanting to widen the breach by their malicious suggestions; and so marked and public was the alienation of the two princes, that when the cardinal of Winchester laboured to effect a reconciliation, and had brought them both within the walls of St. Omer, he could not induce them to speak to each other†. This propitious opportunity was not lost by the ministers of Charles, who employed every expedient to detach the Burgundian from his allies. He had now taken ample revenge for the murder of his father: his prejudices and his interest were intimately connected with the cause of his native sovereign; and the wishes of his council and subjects ran in the same channel. If he still adhered to a league which he now hated and condemned, it was in consideration of his oath not to make peace without the consent of the English. To remove the difficulty it was suggested in a conference between him and his brothers-in-law, the duke of Bourbon, and the constable of France, to attempt a general pacification under the mediation of the pope, as the common father of Christian princes.

To this proposal Eugenius IV. gladly acceded; and A. D. in 1435 was held the congress of Arras, the most illustrious meeting for political purposes which Europe had yet witnessed. The duke of Burgundy, the most magnificent prince of the age, summoned to his court all the nobility of his states; the pontiff was represented by the cardinal of Santa Croce; and the council of Basil, which was then sitting, by the cardinal of Cyprus; the interests of the young Henry were supported by his great-uncle cardinal Beaufort, with twenty-six colleagues, half French and half English*; and Charles sent a legation Aug. of twenty-nine noblemen and ministers, at the head of whom were the duke of Bourbon and the constable. To these were added envoys from the kings of Sicily, Norway, Denmark, and Poland, from many of the princes of Germany and Italy, and from the cities of Flanders and the Hanse Towns. The first days were spent in feastings, tournaments, and parties of pleasure: but even in these the cordiality between the Burgundians and French was sufficiently apparent to awaken the jealousy and apprehensions of the English. The cardinal of Santa Croce opened the conferences with a common-place harangue on the ravages and evils of war; and projects and counterprojects were exchanged for several days: but the pretensions of the two courts were so opposite and extravagant, that every hope of pacification speedily vanished†. Both the cardinals mediators and the Burgundian ministers had been gained by the French. The former openly blamed the inflexibility of the English; the latter had prepared for signature a treaty of amity between their master and Charles. To spare himself the mortification of witnessing so unfavourable a transaction, the cardinal of Winchester, with his colleagues, departed from the scene of negotiation; and three weeks afterwards peace was proclaimed between France and Burgundy. The conditions had been dictated by Philip; that Charles should express his sorrow for the murder, and engage to punish the murderers of the late duke, and should surrender to Philip several fortresses as a security for the payment of four hundred thousand crowns. As soon as the treaty had been signed, the French negotiators, falling on their knees in presence of the duke, begged pardon for the murder of his father; and he laying his hands on a golden cross placed before the eucharist, solemnly declared that he forgave the king from his heart. The cardinals then absolved him and his lords from the oath of alliance with England. To conclude the ceremony, the barons on each side, according to the custom of the age, swore to enforce the observance of the treaty. The inutility and impiety of such oaths were shown by the remark of the lord of Launay, who, when it came to his turn, exclaimed; "This is the sixth peace to which I have sworn since the beginning of the war. The five first were all broken. But as for this, whatsoever others may do, I declare before God that I will observe it *."

To detail the complex but unimportant operations of the war during the ten following years would be a tedious and intricate task. The leading particulars under different heads may suffice to gratify the curiosity of the reader. 1. Before the dissolution of the congress of Arras, the duke of Bedford expired at Rouen. He left the reputation of a prudent statesman, and a brave and experienced general; and his name was long and respectfully remembered by his enemies as well as his countrymen. He was buried in the cathedral on the right hand of the high altar; and when some years later it was suggested to Louis XI. to remove his bones to a less honourable situation, the monarch angrily replied: "I will not war with the remains of a prince who was once a match for your fathers and mine; and who, were he now alive, would make the proudest of us tremble. Let his ashes rest in peace, and may the Almighty have mercy on his soul *!"

* Monstrel. ii. 108—119. Meyer, 323.

2. To the duke of Bedford succeeded Richard duke of York: but before his arrival Paris had returned to the obedience of its native sovereign. The citizens had always been attached to the Burgundians, and with them were willing to transfer their services from Henry to Charles. The gate of St. Jacques was betrayed in the night to Adam de Lisle, and the count de Dunois: chains thrown across the streets prevented the arrival of the English; the lord Willoughby with the garrison retired into the bastile; and an honourable capitulation freed the capital from the dominion of strangers. The duke landed in Normandy with eight thousand men. He soon reduced the towns which had revolted or surrendered to the enemy; and John lord Talbot, afterwards earl of Shrewsbury, by his activity and courage restored the reputation of the English arms. He defeated near Rouen a body of French, who had been invited by the treachery of the inhabitants; and soon afterwards, taking advantage of a fall of snow, surprised the town of Pontoise with a body of men, who, dressed in white, had concealed themselves in the ditch. Thence he spread desolation and terror to the very walls of Paris †.

3. The duke of Burgundy intended to remain neutral: the insults of the English and the inclination of his subjects dragged him into the war. He proved, however, a feeble enemy. Some of his nobles refused to assist him, on the ground of the fealty which they had sworn to the king of England: nor is it improbable that he himself felt some scruple on the same account. This is certain, that he never could be induced to face an English army. At the request of the people of Flanders he undertook to reduce Calais; and the duke of Gloucester, who had been ordered to relieve it, sent the Burgundian a challenge to fight in the open field: but four days before his arrival Philip had retired with precipitation into his own territories. It was in vain that he was followed by Gloucester, to whom Henry, as king of France, had ridiculously granted the earldom of Flanders, forfeited, as it was pretended, by the treason of the Burgundian*. The next year Philip besieged the town of Crotoi at the mouth of the Somme. To succour that fortress Talbot marched from Normandy with a small army of four thousand men. They spent the night at St. Valery: the next morning they plunged into the water at Blanchetaque; and, though it reached to their breasts, crossed the ford without accident. Astonished at their boldness the besiegers retired within their lines, and the duke withdrew to Abbeville. Talbot ravaged the country with impunity: the Burgundians mutinied in the camp; and the garrison seized the opportunity to pursue them to a considerable distance†.

A. D. 1437. In 1437 the duke of York was recalled, and succeeded by Beauchamp, surnamed the good, earl of Warwick, with the title of lieutenant-general, and Governor of France‡. His short administration (for he died at Rouen in less than two years) was not distinguished by any remarkable event. Instead of the ravages of war, both countries were exposed to a more dreadful scourge in the combined operation of famine and pestilence*.

5. In 1439 the earl of Richemont, constable of France recovered the city of Meaux in defiance of the lord Talbot, who endeavoured to raise the siege. But this loss was compensated the next year by the capture of Harfleur, which, with the greater portion of Caux, had been wrested from Henry in 1432. The earl of Somerset, with Talbot and many other distinguished officers, lay before it during several months; and so secure did they consider themselves, that the countess with several ladies consented to spend the summer in the midst of the camp. The count d'Eu, by order of Charles, attempted to relieve the place. The besiegers were attacked at the same time in four different points by sea and land: but every effort to break through their intrenchments proved ineffectual; the assailants were repulsed with considerable loss; and the garrison surrendered†.

6. The complaints of the Parisians stimulated Charles ^{A. D.} to undertake the siege of Pontoise. He invested it with ¹⁴⁴¹ twelve thousand men, threw up bastiles, and fortified May. them with batteries. Talbot on two occasions succeeded in throwing supplies and reinforcements into the place. The duke of York, who had been appointed the king's lieutenant a second time, arrived with eight thousand men, and offered battle to Charles. But the French monarch still respected the valour of his opponents, he refused to fight without a manifest advantage, and contented himself with observing the fords over the

* In England the value of wheat rose to what was then considered the enormous price of three shillings and four pence the bushel: and the people supported life by making bread of pease, beans, and vetches, though in London the merchants by the importation of rye from the Baltic contributed to lessen the scarcity. In France we are told by an eye-witness that the advance in the price of provisions was tenfold; and that the number of those who expired of want and disease among the lower classes was immense. This calamitous visitation lasted two years. See Wyrcest. 459. Monstrel. ii. 151. 155. Feb. 435. Oise. In the night Talbot made a false attack on the bridge of Beaumont, while lower down the river four men silently crossed to the opposite side in a boat of leather, and drew after them several others. A bridge of ropes was now thrown across; and before any discovery was made, six hundred men had strongly intrenched themselves on the left bank. A fruitless attempt was made to dislodge them: the French army dispersed, and the duke reinforced the garrison. He returned to Normandy, leaving two thousand of the enemy in one of the bastiles, which was too strongly fortified to be attacked with impunity; and the sarcasm of the Parisians compelled Charles to resume the siege.

- Sept. At length the French got possession of the church of

7. In the two next years Charles reduced several fortresses in Guienne, while the English spread themselves over Picardy, Maine, and Anjou. The pope repeatedly exhorted the rival powers to lay aside their arms; and

Her efforts were powerfully seconded by cardinal Beaufort, who, aware that the resources of the country and the patience of the people were exhausted, proclaimed himself the advocate of peace; but were as strenuously opposed by the duke of Gloucester, who would never subscribe to the disgrace of surrendering to the enemy what his brother had won at the cost of so much treasure and blood. cabinet, to whom the continuation of war promised greater advantages than any peace which the English ministers dared to conclude. Hence the frequent attempts at negotiation served only to show the superiority assumed by one nation, and to excite irritation and despondency in the other*. But the quarrel with Burgundy, as it involved no great national interest, was more easily appeased. It had arisen from resentment for the apostasy of the duke: but England, in her

* The instructions delivered to the English negotiators on one of these occasions (at Calais, 1439) are still extant, and present a most curious specimen of diplomatic finesse. They were ordered, 1^o. To demand from Charles a formal recognition of Henry's title to the throne of France, and to enforce this demand, not by any inquiry into the king's right, (that had been placed beyond the reach of doubt by the decision of his royal father and Edward III.) but by insisting on the pacification of Troyes, and the judgment of God, manifested by the victories which he had given to small bodies of Englishmen over the immense hosts of their enemies. But 2^o. If the demand were refused, they were to make an offer to Charles of a principality beyond the Loire with an annual income of twenty millions of crowns. 3^o. These, however, were but preliminary flourishes, proposals made that they might be rejected. The lord cardinal of Winchester was now to address the ambassadors of both parties, not as a negotiator, (he was not even named in the commission,) but as a prince of the church, whom his desire to stop the effusion of human blood had induced to assume the character of mediator with the duchess of Burgundy. In a set speech he was to exhort both parties to terminate a quarrel, which had now lasted a hundred years, and which had sacrificed the lives of more men than were at that time alive in the two kingdoms. He was to paint in strong colours the evils of war, both as to the temporal calamities which it inflicts, and the spiritual loss of souls, sent before the tribunal of God in the midst of their sins; he was to observe that the question could be decided only by one of these two ways, the destruction of the English or French people, which was impracticable, or by an equitable adjustment of claims, which, if it were to be adopted, could not be adopted too soon. 4^o. The English ministers were to be marvellously affected by this speech, and in consequence of it to relax in their pretensions, and to offer to Charles the whole of France beyond the Loire, with the exception of Guienne. Nay: rather than incur the guilt of contributing to the evils so feelingly deplored by the cardinal, they were to suffer themselves to be satisfied with the faithful accomplishment of the great peace of Bretigny. But the French envoys were not to be blinded by so flimsy an artifice. They insisted that Henry should cede all his conquests besides Normandy, and hold that duchy, with Guienne, of the crown of France. The proposal was received as an insult; and the duchess proposed a peace for a limited number of years, on condition that Henry should not take, during that time, the title of king of France, nor Charles make any claim of homage during the same period. The ambassadors separated to receive the commands of their sovereigns on this project. At the appointed time the English returned with instructions to refuse, because it would show in the king a lack of might or of right, or of courage; but they had no opportunity of delivering their answer; for the French did not think it worth their while to return at all. See Rym. x. 724, and Acts of Coun. v. 334.

endeavour to punish him, had, by the interruption of the trade with Flanders, inflicted a severe injury on herself. In 1443 Isabella (with her husband Henry seems to have refused to treat*) concluded a suspension of hostilities for an indefinite period with the duke of York†. In the next year her efforts to extend that benefit to all the belligerents were seconded by the more powerful influence of the duke of Orleans, who had been made prisoner at the battle of Azincourt, and after a captivity of twenty-four years had been permitted to revisit his country. Before his departure he paid down forty thousand nobles, gave security for the payment of eighty thousand more in the course of six months, and bound himself to return at the expiration of the year, unless he should prevail on Charles to consent to a final peace; and Henry on his part engaged to repay him the money on the signature of the treaty, or, in failure of that, on his return to captivity‡. He was released about the end of the year 1440; and instead of effecting the purpose of his mission, found himself excluded from the court by the intrigues of the royal favourites. Henry was compelled to enlarge the time fixed for his return; and he at length gained that influence in the council which was due to his rank and abilities. Charles now listened to his suggestions in favour of peace. The duke himself and the earl of Suffolk were the principal negotiators; and though they could not induce their respective courts to agree to any general basis of pacification, concluded an armistice for two years, during which it was hoped that some way might be discovered of adjusting the opposite claims, and reconciling the interests, of the contending sovereigns§.

with the conduct of the war in France: this temporary suspension of hostilities will afford him leisure to revert to the domestic occurrences of the last twenty years, and the miscellaneous incidents, which diversify the history of that period. I. Before James of Scotland was restored ^{A. D.} to his throne, a truce of seven years had been concluded ^{1424.} between the two kingdoms*. By the king it was care-^{Mar.} fully observed; not that he retained any warm attach-^{28.} ment for the place of his captivity, but that he wished for peace, in order to curb the factious spirit of his nobles, and to encourage habits of industry and subordination among his people. Hence his connexion with England did not prevent him from receiving the ambassadors of the French monarch. He renewed the ancient league between the two crowns, and agreed to ^{A. D.} give the princess of Scotland in marriage to the dau-^{1428.} phin, as soon as the parties should have attained the age ^{July} of puberty. His poverty did not enable him to offer ^{17.} with his daughter a portion becoming her rank: but he assented to what was still more acceptable, an aid of six thousand Scottish troops, whenever a fleet for their conveyance should arrive from France†. To secure his friendship, Charles made him a grant of the county of ^{Nov.} Xaintogne, and the lordship of Rochefort, which the king of Scots condescended to hold of the French crown, with an engagement to send the first prince of his blood to perform the accustomed homage‡. These treaties alarmed the English government. The cardinal of Winchester obtained a personal interview with James at Durham; and, ^{A. But the Scottish king adhered firmly to his engagements with France; and the utmost which the envoy could accomplish was to renew the truce for five years, with an understanding that, if any Scotland of Berwick, Roxburgh, and the debateable lands, as the price of a perpetual peace and alliance. This proposal divided the Scottish parliament. During a debate of two days one party maintained that the king by his previous treaty with France was precluded from listening to the offers of England: the other, that no prince could conscientiously bind himself to follow the dictates of another in the matter of war and peace, contrary to the commands of the gospel, and the interests of his people. They separated without coming to any result; and both the French and English envoys failed in the object of their missions*.

Two years later sir Robert Ogle had the presumption to pass the borders, and assist a Scottish lord, who had taken up arms against the king. He was defeated at Piperdan by the earl of Angus. James, irritated by this breach of the armistice, demanded reparation; but, though commissioners were appointed by Henry, and a letter was written by him to the king of Scots with his own hand, the difference was not accommodated*. ^{A. She was, however, more fortunate than her father had been in similar circumstances; and by steering round the north of Scotland, eluded the English squadron, and reached the port of Rochelle †. This new insult determined James to seek revenge with the sword. He summoned every Scot between the ages of sixteen and sixty to join his banner; and, if we may believe a native and contemporary writer, more than two hundred thousand men followed him to the siege of Roxburgh ‡. The fall of the fortress was prevented by the inconstancy of the king, who, after a few days, on the approach of the earl of Northumberland, disbanded the army, and hastened to Edinburgh. It were idle to enumerate all the motives to which different writers have attributed his conduct: the most plausible conjecture supposes him to have received a hint of the dark and mysterious conspiracy, which within six months deprived him of life*. He was succeeded by his son, James II., who had only completed his fifth year; and one of the first acts of the new reign was the conclusion of a truce with Henry till the year 1447 †.

II. England, during this period, exhibited the unusual spectacle of two princesses, who, despising the pride of birth, had married into the families of commoners. 1°. Jacquetta of Luxemburgh, after the death of the duke of Bedford, married sir Richard Wydeville, an English gentleman, distinguished by the extraordinary beauty of his person. Wydeville was immediately cast into prison for the offence of marrying a tenant of the crown with-

* It was in August that he raised the siege: at Christmas he repaired to his favourite residence in the Dominican convent at Perth. On the evening of the 20th of February, after drinking the voidee, or parting cup, with his company, he retired to his bed-chamber, and as he stood in his gown before the fire, conversing with the queen and her attendants, he was suddenly alarmed by the clash of arms. Aware of the danger, he called to the ladies to bolt the door, while he should escape by the window. But the iron bars were too close to admit a human body between them; and the king, seizing the fire-tongs, rushed into an adjoining closet, wrenched up one of the boards from the floor, and let himself through the aperture into the privy. The board immediately dropped into its former place; and it soon appeared that the noise proceeded from sir Robert Graham, who, with three hundred highlanders had scaled the defences of the monastery. They burst open the door, broke the arm of Catherine Douglas, who attempted to exclude them, and wounded the queen, when a voice exclaimed, "For shame! She is but a woman. Look after her husband." Not finding him in the bed-chamber, they parted in separate directions to search the adjoining rooms; and James, seizing the opportunity, called to the ladies to draw him out. In the attempt Elizabeth Douglas fell through the aperture; and during the confusion caused by this event one of the assassins entered the closet. He informed his associates. Sir John Hall leaped below, and was followed by his brother; but the king, an athletic man, seized each in the descent, and attempted to throttle them on the floor. Graham sprang to their assistance. At the entreaties and promises of James he began to waver; but his confederates above terrified him by their threats; and the unarmed monarch was despatched with sixteen wounds. out the royal license; but obtained his liberty on the payment of a fine of one thousand pounds, and was afterwards, out of respect to his wife, created baron Rivers*. 2°. Catherine, a daughter of France, the widow of the last, the mother of the present sovereign, married Owen ap Tudor, a Welsh gentleman, said to be descended from the celebrated Cadwallader†. It does not appear that this marriage was ever formally acknowledged; but it was followed by an act of parliament, by which to marry a queen dowager without license from the king was made an offence punishable with the forfeiture of lands and goods‡; and, as soon as Catherine was dead, Tudor received a summons at Daventry to appear in person before the king. At his demand a safe conduct was granted him, but afterwards violated. He escaped from prison, was retaken, and escaped a second time. With the real cause of this severity we are not acquainted: the act of parliament had passed after his marriage, and there is no mention made of it in the acts of the council: from the expressions used there it may perhaps be inferred that he had done or said something to raise apprehensions, that sprung, as was pretended, from the ancient princes of Wales, and proud of his alliance by marriage with the royal families of England and France, Owen ap Tudor might be tempted to re-enact the part of Owen Glendower, and might, like that chieftain, meet with willing and enthusiastic support from the national predilections of his countrymen§. However that may have been, Tudor, after his second escape, was suffered to remain without molestation. Henry acknowledged his sons by Catherine for brothers, and created Edmund A. D. 1452. earl of Richmond, and Jasper earl of Pembroke; Owen, the youngest, became a monk in the abbey of Westminster.

III. It was probably owing to this marriage that Henry, when he was only in his third year, had been taken out of the hands of his mother, and intrusted to the care of A. D. 1424. dame Alice Botiller, to whom as his governess the infant monarch was made to give authority by special warrant, and with the advice of the council, to chastise him Feb. 21. from time to time, in reasonable wise, as the case might require, without being subsequently called to account . From the tuition of dame Alice he passed in his seventh A. D. 1428. year to the charge of the earl of Warwick, who, in his patent of appointment, was ordered to look to the health June 1. and safety of the royal person, to watch over the education of his pupil in morals and virtue, in literature and the languages, in manners and courtesy, and in all the acquirements which become a great king; and to chastise his negligence or disobedience in such manner as other princes of the same age were wont to be chastised †. But when Henry had reached his eleventh year, Warwick applied to the council for more ample powers. He found that officious persons, to make their court to the sovereign, had filled his mind with notions of his own importance, and that he would no longer submit to the punishments, which it was occasionally deemed A. D. 1432. necessary to inflict. The earl therefore demanded authority to appoint or dismiss the persons composing the Nov. 29. royal household; to prevent any stranger from speaking with the king unless it were in presence of one of the four knights of the body; and to remove him from place to place as he saw it necessary for his health or security. He also required the council to admonish the king in a body, of the necessity of obedience to his preceptor, and to promise that they would stand by him, if on account of chastisement his pupil should conceive any antipathy against him. All these demands were granted. It was, however, impossible to exclude flatterers from the prince; who, at their suggestions, in his fourteenth year ^{A.D.} demanded to be admitted into the council, and to be ^{1434.} made acquainted with the manner in which the concerns ^{Nov.} of his kingdom were conducted. This claim was resisted ^{12.} with firmness, but with respect†. Yet Henry, though he acquiesced for the present, three years afterwards ^{A.D.} renewed his demand. To satisfy him, it was resolved, ^{1437.} that the pardon of offences, the collation of benefices, ^{Nov.} and all special graces should be reserved to the king; that he should be made acquainted with all debates of importance respecting his crown and prerogatives; and should decide in all matters, regarding which the council should be so far divided in opinion that the majority did

† The members of the council (the duke of Gloucester alone was absent) replied, that, "God, indeed, had endowed the king with as great understanding and feeling as ever they saw or knew in any prince or other person of his age: nevertheless, to quit them truly to God, to the king, and to his people, they dare not take upon them to put him in conceit or opinion that he is yet endowed with so great feeling, knowledge, and wisdom, the which must in great part grow of experience, nor with so great foresight and discretion to depart and choose in matters of great weight and difficulty, as is expedient and behoveful to him and his people. They therefore think it would be perilous and harmful to change the rule and governance that afore this in his tender age hath been appointed for the good and surety of his noble person, and of this land: and trust, that if any such motion be again made to him, before he agree to it, he will take the advice of his great council, or of his continual council, for the time being: the which manner of his demeaning, it is allowed and thought, will be the best that can be advised." not exceed two-thirds of the members*. Thus the government remained till he became of full age.

IV. The reader has already noticed the commencement of the quarrel between the duke of Gloucester and his uncle the bishop of Winchester. Their mutual rivalry converted these near relations into the bitterest enemies, and gave insensibly an opposite direction to their views of national polity. The duke proclaimed himself the warm and inexorable advocate of war: the bishop contended with equal vehemence for peace; and, as the council perpetually oscillated between the influence of the one and of the other, the war was never conducted with vigour, and obstacles were constantly opposed to the conclusion of peace. The bickerings between these two ministers are of themselves beneath the notice of history; but they derive importance from their consequences, which were felt through the greater portion of Henry's reign.

When Beaufort, during the life of the last monarch, visited the council of Basil, he was named by Martin V. cardinal and apostolic legate in England, Ireland, and Wales, with a promise that his creation and appointment should be afterwards published in the accustomed manner†. The intelligence alarmed the jealousy of arch-

 Dec. 28. stay was too short to create any permanent prejudice to the rights of the metropolitan: but Beaufort would fix his residence in England, and by his superior authority suspend or limit for years that jurisdiction which belonged to the successors of St. Augustine. On this

‡ After alluding to the ambition of Beaufort, he tells the king that, "There never was no legate a latere sent into no land, and specially into the realm of England, without great and notable cause. And they, when

between that prelate and his nephew of Gloucester. It has been already mentioned that Beaufort condescended to make him an apology, resigned the chancellorship, and obtained permission to travel: but it is probable that by these concessions he purchased the royal license to accept the preferments to which he had been named in the court of Rome. He was soon afterwards declared cardinal priest of St. Eusebius, was invested with the usual habit at Calais, received the hat at Mechlin, and was appointed captain-general of the crusaders destined to oppose the Bohemian Hussites*. His absence perhaps encouraged, or his promotion stimulated the ambition of the duke of Gloucester, who at the next meeting of parliament required of the lords a declaration of the powers invested in him as protector. Whether it was on this or some other account, is uncertain, but the parliament was soon afterwards prorogued. When it opened again, the duke repeated his demand, adding that he would not take his seat till it was answered, and admonishing the house not to pass any bill in his absence. The reply must have proved most mortifying to his ambition. They reminded him that the act which gave him the title of protector invested him with no authority except in the two cases of foreign invasion, and internal revolt; "marvelled from their hearts" that after he had subscribed this act he should pretend to any additional power; declared that in parliament he was no more than any other peer; and exhorted him to resume his seat, and attend to the business of the nation, as he was bound to do in obedience to the king's writ. The duke reluctantly acquiesced†.

About six months later the cardinal ventured to return to England; and at his entry into the metropolis was

Sept. met in solemn procession by the clergy, the mayor, and been received with honour, his new dignity had made him an object of suspicion. In the presence of the was compelled to promise that he would abstain in the execution of his office from every act which might derowhich he accepted the dignity of cardinal†. When he remonstrated, the council replied, that it was at least a difficult and doubtful question, which they dared not solve during the minority of the king; and to this answer he was content to submit, that he might not by opposition defeat the project in which he was now engaged. As soon as Cunzo, the papal envoy, had delivered the letters of Martin V. to the council, the cardinal exmen whom he had raised for the crusade should be led July against the king's enemies in France; and the council,^{1.} on their part, engaged to indemnify him to the pontiff for this breach of his duty. He received their bonds; but promised to keep this part of the transaction secret, and not to apply for payment from them till he should fail in his attempt to procure it from the regency of France*. When Charles found the crusaders arrayed against himself, he complained most bitterly to the pontiff, who loudly protested his ignorance of this fraudulent transaction, and upbraided the cardinal with having injured the cause of religion, and stained the reputation of the holy see. Beaufort attempted to justify himself by allegations which it is difficult to believe; that the orders of his sovereign were intimated to him in such terms that he durst not disobey; and that the men themselves declared to his face that they would not march against the Hussites, but were determined to restore the superiority of the English arms in France†.

If the conduct of the cardinal on this occasion irritated the court of Rome, it served to add to his popularity in England; and when the parliament assembled, both houses seemed to contend which should heap upon him the most distinguished honours. The same objection Sept. which excluded him from the feast of St. George had^{22.} also excluded him from the king's council: but the lords Dec. now requested him, for the service of the king, and the^{18.} benefit of the nation, to resume his seat at that board, and to absent himself only when subjects were debated which concerned the court of Rome‡. second supply, took the opportunity to preface it with a panegyric on the virtues and services of the cardinal*.

It is generally believed that the duke of Gloucester, finding himself unable to exclude his rival from the cabinet by force, undertook to remove him by policy. So much is certain, that Beaufort, at the repeated instances of the council, consented to accompany the young king to France; and that during his absence an ungenerous attempt was made to ruin him forever. In a numerous meeting of the peers, the king's attorney, on the ground 1431. that the dignity of cardinal was incompatible with the possession of a bishopric, proposed that he should be Nov. 6. removed from the see of Winchester, and condemned to refund its revenues from the day of his promotion in the court of Rome. Gloucester immediately rose, charged his uncle with having obtained for himself and his diocese a bull of exemption from the jurisdiction of Canterbury, and contended that by such act he had incurred the penalties of premunire. But of this charge no satisfactory evidence was produced; and the lords after a long debate resolved, that the cardinal should be heard in his own defence, and that in the interval the records should be searched for precedents, and the judges be required to deliver their opinions†. The duke, however, was not discouraged. Three weeks later the subject was again brought forward in a meeting of the Nov. 28.

* Facta prius speciali recommendatione reverendissimi in Christo patris et domini, domini Henrici, permissione divina titulo S. Eusebii, presbyteri cardinalis de Anglia vulgariter nuncupati, per prolocutorem suum ulterius declarabant, &c. Ibid. p. 337. I quote the words of the record, because they have generally been misunderstood to mean, that the commons granted a second subsidy at the recommendation of the cardinal.

† Rym. x. 497. The objections now made were the cause, that when Eugenius in 1440 named the archbishops of York and Rouen cardinals, both these prelates refused that dignity; and to relieve them from all apprehension, Henry granted them the royal license to retain their bishoprics together with the cardinalate, and the pope solemnly declared that it had not been his intention by introducing them into the sacred college, to remove them from their churches of York and Rouen. The writs issued on this occasion show how difficult it was for ecclesiastics at this period to secure themselves from the operation of the statutes of premunire. Rym. x. 753, 840.

privy council, in which the majority of the members belonged to his party: but the abbot of Chertsey, the cardinal's vicar general, pleaded successfully for delay, urging among other reasons the indecency of condemning in his absence a prelate so nearly related to the king, and actually attendant on the royal person beyond the sea at the request of the council; and the lords, though, to gratify the duke, they ordered the sealing of the writs of premunire and attachment, prevailed on him to consent that the execution should be suspended till the return of the king*.

It was not to be expected that Beaufort, with such writs hanging over his head, would venture upon English ground till he was secure of protection from the enmity of his nephew. He accompanied the young Henry from Rouen to Calais: but there, having obtained permission to travel to Rome, he took leave of his sovereign. His intended journey was probably a pretence. He felt too seriously interested in the proceedings against him in England to leave the coast of Flanders. Two months after the arrival of Henry a parliament assembled, and a bill of indemnity, to protect him from the penalties of premunire, if they had been incurred, was brought into the commons, and met with no opposition in its progress through either house. Shortly afterwards he appeared in his place, on a day when Henry was present†. He had obtained, he said, the king's leave to proceed to Rome at the requisition of the sovereign pontiff, when he heard that it was intended to charge him with treason in his absence. As his reputation was dearer to him than any other treasure, he had returned to face his accuser. Let him come forth, whosoever he might be, and he should find him ready to answer. After some deliberation between the duke and the lords, it was replied; that no one appeared to make such a charge, and that the king held him to be a good and faithful subject. Beaufort thanked his sovereign for his gracious declaration, and demanded that it might be delivered to him in writing under the king's signature: not that he meant to plead it on a future occasion—he scorned to depend on any thing but his own innocence—but that it might be publicly known that no one dared to support such an accusation against him. His request was granted, and the declaration was entered on the rolls*.

A seizure of jewels, belonging to the cardinal, had lately been made at Sandwich, by order of Gloucester, and probably under the pretence of a false entry at the custom-house, as to their description or value†. Beaufort now demanded the restoration of his property: which after a long debate was ordered in parliament on the following singular condition; that he should deposit 6000*l.* in the king's hands; that Henry within the six next years should determine whether the seizure was just and legal or not, and that in accordance with such determination he should retain or repay the money. At the same time the cardinal made to the king a loan of 6000*l.*, in addition to 8000*l.* previously advanced, to be repaid out of the first supply granted by parliament‡.

From this period, during several years, the uncle and nephew, equally jealous of each other, laboured to strengthen their own influence by the advancement of their dependents. Gloucester on all occasions brought

† That the seizure was made by order of the duke appears to me plain from the proviso at the end of the act; and I think it probable that the jewels had been condemned in the exchequer under pretence of the entry, from the non obstante clause. Rym. x. 517.

‡ Ibid. Two years later, in a great council, the king at the request of the lords admitted that he had no right in conscience to the jewels, and ordered the 6,000*l.* to be repaid: on which the cardinal lent him 1,000 marks towards the war in France. forward Richard duke of York, in whom were now centred the rights of the family of Clarence: the cardinal espoused on all occasions the interests of his nephew, Henry Beaufort, earl, and afterwards duke of Somerset. The former continued to preside in the cabinet, and to gratify his rapacity by obtaining grants from the crown. the latter annually aided the government with loans, and conducted in person almost every negotiation with foreign powers. Though these, as far as regarded peace, had been hitherto unsuccessful, they served to augment his popularity. The nation, exhausted by a long and ruinous contest, naturally transferred its attachment from the patron of war to the advocate of peace. —

At length the two rivals made the grand trial of their strength. The duke of Orleans had often and earnestly ^{A. D.} sued to obtain his liberation, promising to exert all his ^{1439.} influence to bend the French cabinet to proposals of peace. The cardinal favoured, the duke opposed his petition. The former argued, that in the present exhausted state of the nation, it was prudent to employ every probable expedient to put an honourable termination to the war; and that at all events the ransom of the duke would enable the king to continue the contest for two years without any additional burden to the people. Gloucester built his opposition on the abilities of the prisoner, and his acquaintance with the policy and resources of England. Charles and his son, he observed, were princes of slender capacity, guided by their ministers, and placed in opposition to each other by the intrigues of their favourites: but were the duke of Orleans to obtain his liberty, he would unite the two parties, assume the direction of the cabinet, and teach the English to condemn their own folly in supplying the enemy with so able a counsellor*. To lessen the influence of the cardinal, Gloucester delivered to the king a memorial, containing the real or supposed transgressions of that prelate, under twenty different heads: but though it is probable that out of so great a number some charges may have been founded in fact, the majority prove rather the enmity of the nephew than the guilt of the uncle*. The king read the memorial: but it seems not to have made on his mind any impression unfavourable to Beaufort. The negotiation with the duke of Orleans continued; and, as the council was divided in opinion, the arguments on both sides, according to the late arrangement respecting such cases, were laid before Henry in writing. He decided in favour of the cardinal. Gloucester, who could ill brook his defeat, lodged on the rolls of chancery a solemn and argumentative protest against the measure†; and, to give

 Oct. the greater publicity to his disapprobation, retired to which the duke of Orleans was to swear on the sacrament that he would fulfil his engagements*.

* He accuses him of ambition in seeking the dignity of cardinal after he had been prohibited by the late king, and of contempt of the royal authority in receiving the papal bulls, retaining his bishopric of Winchester, and procuring an exemption from the authority of the primate, without the king's permission. But if these offences subjected him, as Gloucester maintained, to the penalties of, premunire, it should be remembered that they had been long ago pardoned by act of parliament. In the next place he complains of Beaufort's avarice, whose riches are too great to have been honestly procured. He makes, indeed, loans to the king, but seldom executes his engagements with fidelity, seeking pretexts to appropriate to himself the securities which he obtains, and defrauding the crown by means of his officers, who receive the customs in the port of Southampton. The cardinal's services in foreign embassies, so frequently applauded by the parliament, have, he maintains, produced advantage to no one but the king's enemies. By the congress at Arras he furnished the means of reconciliation to Charles and the duke of Burgundy; and by the late negotiation at Calais, to the duke of Burgundy and the duke of Bourbon. It was the private interest of his family that induced him to liberate without authority the king of Scots; and some similar motive urges him now to insist so earnestly on the release of the duke of Orleans. In short he has contrived to arrogate all the powers of government to himself and his creature the archbishop of York; keeps at a distance from the king all those prelates and lords that are sincerely attached to the royal person; and has on all occasions opposed the offers of the duke of Gloucester to lead an army into France and recover for Henry the whole of his inheritance. See his memorial at length in Hall, (161—166) who has placed it in the wrong year. From internal evidence it appears to have been composed after the negotiation at Calais in June, 1435, and before the renewal of that negotiation in May, 1440, or the assumption of the cardinalate by the archbishop of York on 4th February, 1440. I conceive therefore that it was presented to the king about the close of 1433.

The duke was, however, destined to experience a still more cruel disgrace. Though, by his marriage with his mistress, he had legitimated their union, he had not raised her character in the estimation of the public; and the pride, the avarice, and the licentiousness of dame Eleanor (so she was called) ultimately led to her ruin. There have been in all ages professors of the black art; nor is it so very long since men have had the good sense to laugh at their pretensions. One of the duke's chaplains, Roger Bolingbroke, was accused of necromancy, and exhibited with the instruments of his art to the admiring populace on a platform before St. Paul's, "arrayed in marvellous attire," bearing in his right hand a sword, and in his left a sceptre, and sitting in a chair, on the four corners of which were fixed four swords, and on the points of the swords four images of copper†. The second night afterwards dame Eleanor secretly withdrew into the sanctuary of Westminster, a step which naturally excited suspicion. She was confronted with Bolingbroke, who declared that it was at her instigation that he had first applied to the study of magic. From the inquiry which followed, it appeared that Eleanor was a firm believer in the mysteries of the art; that, to secure the affection of the duke, she had employed love-potions furnished by Marjory Jourdain, the celebrated witch of Eye; and that, to learn what would be her subsequent lot (her husband was presumptive heir to the throne) she had

† Clericus famosissimus unus illorum in toto mundo in astronomia et arte nigromantica. Wil. Wyrces. 461. It was probably on account of his learning that he had been admitted into the duke's family. That prince is celebrated by contemporaries as the great patron of learned men. Æneas Sylvius, afterwards pope Pius II., in a letter to Adam Molins, whom he praises for his eloquence, says: "Sed magnæ ob hanc causam grates clarissimo illi et doctissimo principi Gloucestræ duci, qui studia humanitatis summo studio in regnum vestrum recepi, qui, sicut mihi relatum est, poetas mirifice colit, et oratores magnopere veneratur." charged Bolingbroke to discover the duration of the king's life. Soon afterwards an indictment of treason was found against Bolingbroke and Southwell, a canon of St. Paul's, as principals, and the duchess as an accessory. The former were said, at the solicitation of the latter, to have formed an image of wax, and to have exposed it to a gentle heat, under the persuasion, that as the image melted away, the health of the king would gradually decline. The two women, however, were

Oct. arraigned before the ecclesiastical court. Jourdain, 21. as a relapsed witch, was condemned to be burnt: Eleanor, out of twenty-eight articles brought against her, confessed some and denied others; but when the testimony of the witnesses had been heard, withdrew her plea, and submitted to the mercy of the court. She was compelled, on three days of the week, to walk hoodless, and bearing a lighted taper in her hand, through the

Oct. streets of the capital; and was afterwards confined a 23. prisoner for life, with an annuity of one hundred marks for her support*. Southwell died in the Tower before his trial: two others obtained their pardon: but Boling-

Nov. broke was convicted and executed, acknowledging the 13. guilt of necromancy, but denying that of treason†. Though the duke himself does not appear to have been implicated in this ridiculous but tragical business, he must have deeply felt on account of the disgrace of his wife, and the notion generally entertained that he was looking forward to the succession for himself.

The character which the duke of Gloucester had attributed to Charles of France belonged with more justice to his own nephew, the king of England. Henry was free from vice, but devoid of capacity. Gentle and inoffensive, he was shocked at the very shadow of injustice, but easy and unassuming, was always ready to adopt the opinion of his advisers. He was now twenty-three years old: his council suggested that it was time he should marry; and every one foresaw that the queen, whoever she might be, would possess the control over the weak mind of her husband. When the count of Armagnac quarrelled with the king of France, it was thought that the power of that nobleman might form a bulwark of defence to the province of Guienne; and commissioners were appointed to offer to his daughter the hand of the English monarch*. But the transaction did not elude the vigilance of Charles, who immediately invaded the territories of the count, and made him and his family prisoners. Two years later the choice of Henry was directed towards Margaret, the daughter of René, king of Sicily and Jerusalem, and duke of Anjou, Maine, and Bar. In personal beauty she was thought superior to most women, in mental capacity equal to most men of the age. But it was not the charms of her person, nor the powers of her mind that recommended her to the notice of the king's ministers. She was a near relation to Charles, who had always treated her with marked partiality; and a hope was cherished that through her mediation a satisfactory and permanent peace might be established between the two kingdoms. The charge of conducting the negotiation was intrusted to William de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, and was accepted by him with real or affected reluctance. He professed to believe himself unequal to the task. Perhaps he feared the subsequent resentment of Gloucester, who opposed the measure: perhaps he felt uneasy under the menaces of an act of parliament, passed in the reign of Henry V., which made it highly penal in any man to conclude a peace with Charles, unless the consent of the three estates in both realms had been previously obtained. To tranquillize his mind a singular instrument was signed by the king, and approved by the parliament, which authorized the earl to conduct the treaty to the best of his abilities, and pardoned beforehand every error of judgment into which he might fall*.

A. D. 1444. He met the duke of Orleans at Tours: a truce preparatory to a peace was concluded, and the question of the marriage repeatedly discussed. On the Feb. 20. part of the French no opposition was raised: but several alarming difficulties suggested themselves to the mind of the English negotiator. The father of the princess with all his sounding titles was in reality a pauper. This nominal king of Jerusalem and Sicily possessed not one foot of land in either country; his duchies of Maine and Anjou were, and had long been, in the possession of the English: and his territory of Bar was mortgaged to the duke of Burgundy for the payment of his ransom. Suffolk consented to take the lady without a marriage portion. But it was asked, could the king of England think of marrying the daughter, while he kept the father out of his patrimonial dominions? The earl felt the force of the objection, but foresaw the danger of making the cession. At length he yielded: it was stipulated that Maine and Anjou should be restored; and at his return he prevailed on the majority of the council to approve of his conduct. In a general promotion of the chief nobility he was created marquess of Suffolk, and measuring back his steps, was solemnly contracted, as proxy for Henry, with Margaret in the cathedral of Nanci. Justs and tournaments for eight days testified the joy of the court: Charles attended his fair kinswoman some miles from the city, and parted April 18. from her in tears. Her father accompanied her to Bar le Duc. She landed at Porchester, was married to Henry May at Tichfield, and crowned with the usual ceremony at ^{30.} Westminster.

If Henry had flattered himself that his marriage would be followed by a peace, his expectations must have been grievously disappointed. Charles had determined to exclude, if it were possible, the English from the soil of France, and would only consent to short prolongations of the armistice, that he might improve the first opportunity, which should be offered by chance, or by the imprudence of the English monarch. His hopes were encouraged by the disputes in the council of his adversary, whose ministers were too busily employed in struggles for power at home to support with vigour the national interests abroad. The queen had already gained the ascendancy over the easy mind of her husband; and Suffolk, the favourite of them both, gradually supplanted all his colleagues. The cardinal, who had retired to his bishopric soon after the last dispute with his nephew, appeared no more on the scene, unless it were to relieve the urgent wants of the crown with advances of money. Gloucester still attended the council occasionally: but, if we may believe the unauthenticated accounts of some writers, was chiefly employed in opposing the plans, and protecting himself against the intrigues of the favourite. We may however question their accuracy. Certain it is that he publicly testified his approbation of the king's marriage; and that, when Suffolk in parliament detailed the particulars of the treaty, and the commons petitioned Henry to approve the conduct of that minister, the duke on his knees seconded their request†. Of his conduct June from that period we are ignorant; and our ignorance^{4.} prevents us from unravelling the causes of the mysterious transaction which followed. It may be that Gloucester, harassed by the accusations of his enemies, had formed a plan to make himself master of the royal person *; or that Suffolk, to screen himself from the resentment of the duke, infused into the mind of Henry suspicions of the loyalty of his uncle†. However it were, Henry summoned a parliament to meet, not as usual, at Westminster, but at Bury St. Edmund's. The precautions which were taken excited surprise, and gave birth to numerous conjectures. The knights of the shire received orders to come in arms; the men of Suffolk were arrayed; numerous guards were placed round the king's residence; and patrols during the night watched all the roads leading to the town. The duke of Gloucester left his castle of Devizes, and was present at the opening of parliament: the next day he was arrested in his lodgings on a charge of high treason, by the lord Beaumont, constable of England; and seventeen days later was found dead in his bed, without any exterior marks of violence. Reports were spread that he died of apoplexy, or of a broken heart: suspicion whispered that he had been privately murdered‡. Several knights and esquires in his service, most of

* We are told that he was accused in the council of illegal executions, and of having unjustly enriched himself at the expense of the crown. From a singular instrument in Rymer it appears that he had been compelled to resign some possessions in Guienne, which were immediately given to John de Foix, who had married a niece of Suffolk; both circumstances of a nature to irritate a proud and ambitious mind. † What evidence the king had we know not: but nothing could persuade him that his uncle was innocent. Whethamstede, 367.

‡ I am inclined to believe that he died a natural death, on the authority of Whethamstede, abbot of St. Alban's. That writer, who had received many benefits from the duke, was much attached to his memory, which he vindicates on all occasions, and equally prejudiced against his enemies, whom he calls canes, scorpiones, impii susurriones, p. 366. And yet, though he wrote when the royal party was humbled in the dust, and he had of course nothing to fear from their resentment, he repeatedly asserts that the duke fell ill immediately after his arrest, and died of his illness. Fecit eum arrestari, ponique in tam arcta custodia, quod præ tristitia decideret in lectum ægritudinis, et infra paucos dies posterius accederet in fata, p. 365. Of course he could not be in perfect health on the evening preceding his death, as we are told by some writers. Again, Whethamstede says: "This great warrior and second David, præ tristitia modo deposuit arma sua, recessitque ad regionem illam, ubi pax est et tranquilla requies sine inquietudine ulla," p. 366. Also Hardyng, 400.

them Welshmen, had assembled at Greenwich on the very day of his arrest, and purposed to join him at Bury. They were, however, made prisoners, and five of their number were brought to trial, and convicted, on a charge July of having conspired to release dame Eleanor, to come⁸ to the parliament in arms, to destroy the king, and to raise Gloucester to the throne*. But the humanity of Henry did not permit them to suffer. He had been much affected by a sermon of Dr. Worthington, a celebrated preacher, on the forgiveness of injuries; and declared that he could not better prove his gratitude for the protection afforded to him by the Almighty, than July by pardoning in obedience to the Divine command the¹⁴ persons who, so he believed, had plotted his destruction †. Dame Eleanor, on account of "her former misgovern-ment of herself," was rendered, by act of parliament, incapable of claiming as the duke's widow ‡, and a great part of his estates was distributed among the marquess of Suffolk, and Suffolk's relatives and adherents §. But Gloucester, though he had no issue, left many friends, who laboured to clear his memory from the stain of treason. In each successive parliament they introduced a bill declaratory of his loyalty: but no arguments

† They were, however, tied up, instantly cut down, stripped, and marked for dismemberment by the knife of the executioner. At that moment Suffolk announced to them the king's mercy. Stow, 386. This pardon, however, has been represented, on mere conjecture, as an artifice of Suffolk to lessen the odium which he had incurred by the murder of Gloucester. But it is well known that Henry's humanity abhorred the punishment usually inflicted for treason. One day seeing the quarter of a person, who had been executed, fixed on the Tower, he exclaimed: "Take it away. 'It is a shame to use any Christian so cruelly on my account.'" (Blackman, 301.) In the present case the king asserts that the pardon had not been suggested to him by any person, either layman or clergyman, but that it originated from religious considerations, principally because God seemed to have taken the cause into his own hands, having during the late year "touched and stricken certain of those who had been disloyal to him;" supremus iudex nonnullas personas nobis infideles tetigit et percussit. Rym. xi. 17*. Who were the persons whom God had stricken? Of course Gloucester was one; and the expression is a proof that in the opinion of Henry he died a natural death; for this religious prince would never have used it, if the duke had been murdered. But who were the others?

could subdue the conviction or prejudice of the king; the bill was repeatedly thrown out by the influence of the crown; and, if the attempt at last succeeded, it was under the protection of the duke of York, who had by force invested himself with the powers of government*.

Within six weeks the duke was followed to the grave by his uncle and former competitor, cardinal Beaufort. April 11. That prelate, since his retirement from court, had resided in his diocese, and applied himself to the exercise of his functions. That he expired in the agonies of despair, is a fiction, which we owe to the imagination of Shakspeare: from an eye-witness we learn that during a lingering illness he devoted most of his time to religious exercises†. According to the provisions of his will, his wealth was chiefly distributed in charitable donations: no less a sum than four thousand pounds was set aside for the relief of the indigent prisoners in the capital; and the hospital of St. Cross, in the vicinity of Winchester, still exists a durable monument of his munificence‡.

† Hall tells us that, according to his chaplain John Baker, he lamented on his death-bed that money could not purchase life; and that death should cut him off when he hoped, now his nephew Gloucester was gone, to procure the papal tiara. Hall, p. 152. It is not, however, probable that such an idea could be entertained by a man eighty years of age, and labouring under a mortal disease. Three weeks after the death of the duke, the cardinal ordered himself to be carried into the great hall of his palace of Wolvesey, where the clergy of the city and the monks of the cathedral were assembled. There he sat or lay while a dirge was sung, the funeral ceremony performed, and his will publicly read. The next morning they assembled again: a mass of requiem was celebrated, and his will was again read with the addition of several codicils. He then took leave of all, and was carried back to his chamber. What was the object of this singular ceremony, I know not; but it was much admired by the writer, who was present; and sufficiently disproves the story of his having died in despair. Cont. Hist. Croyl. 582.

‡ His executor offered the king a present of 2000*l*. Henry refused it, saying, "He was always a most kind uncle to me, while he lived. God reward him! Fulfil his intentions. I will not take his money." It was bestowed on the two colleges founded by the king at Eton and in Cambridge. Blackm. 294. It should be remembered that he received no interest on the monies which he lent to the king; whatever benefit he could derive from them, seems to have arisen from the forfeiture of pledges if not redeemed, and the repayment in gold instead of silver coin. Thus he demands "that paiement be maad in golde of the coigne of Eng." lond of juste weighte; elles I not to be bounde to deliuer ayeus the

The deaths of the duke and the cardinal removed the two firmest supports of the house of Lancaster, and awakened the ambition of Richard, duke of York, who by the paternal line was sprung from Edward Langley, the youngest son of Edward III., and by the maternal had become, after the death of the earl of March, in 1424, the representative of Lionel, the third son of the same monarch. But, if he now began to turn his eyes towards the throne, he had the prudence to conceal his intentions till the incapacity of Henry, or the imprudence of his ministers, should offer him an opportunity of seizing the splendid prize. He had been appointed regent of France during five years: but the duke of Somerset, who sought to succeed to the influence of his relatives, the late cardinal and the duke of Gloucester, expressed a wish to possess that command; and York was reluctantly induced to exchange it for the government of Ireland. The affront sank deep into his breast: he began to consider Somerset as a rival; and, to prepare himself for the approaching contest, sought to win by affability and munificence the affections of the Irish.

If Henry felicitated himself on the acquisition of so accomplished and beautiful a wife, his dreams of happiness were disturbed by the murmurs of the people. It was said that his union with Margaret had been purchased at too great a price; that no minister could be authorized to give away the inheritance of the crown; and that the cession of Anjou and Maine, the keys of Normandy, would inevitably draw after it the loss of all the conquests made by the king's father. At first these complaints were despised: insensibly they grew louder and more frequent; and Suffolk for his own protection ^{May} demanded to be confronted with his accusers in presence 25.

"seide weddes (pledges) though the seide paiement were offrede to be "maad in silver." The king in consequence orders the treasurer to make repayment "en ore a nos coustages." Acts of Coun. iv. 234. 243.

of the king and the council. His request was granted; the pleadings of each party were heard; and the favourite, as was to be expected, triumphed in the judgment of Henry. A proclamation was published, declaring Suffolk to have acted the part of a true and loyal servant, and imposing silence on his accusers under the penalty of losing the offices which they held under the crown*. Still, however, obstacles were opposed to the cession of Maine by the persons holding grants of land in that country; and Charles, weary of the tergiversation of the English government, resolved to cut the knot with the sword, and invested the capital of the province with an army. Henry was in no condition to recommence the war; and the bishop of Chichester hastened to the scene of hostilities; surrendered the whole province with the exception of Fresnoi, and obtained in return a truce to last for two years, and an assurance that the grantees of the English crown should receive from France a sum of money equal to ten years' value of the lands which they had lost. At the same time a protestation was made, that Henry did not resign his right to the sovereignty of the province, but only its actual possession, on condition that the revenue might be enjoyed by the father and uncle of his queen†.

Maine was soon filled with French troops, and the duke, alarmed at their approach, represented to the council that almost every fortress under his command had been suffered to fall into ruins; that the three estates of Normandy had, under the plea of poverty, refused any aid; and that, unless speedy and plentiful assistance were furnished from England, the province would in all probability be lost‡. Charles, however, did not allow his adversaries time to furnish such assistance. It had chanced that the soldiers, who had withdrawn from the ceded territory, finding themselves without quarters and without subsistence, surprised and pillaged Fougères, a town in

Bretagne. Somerset, aware of the consequences, hastened to disavow the act; and Charles, with equal promptitude, demanded instant and satisfactory reparation. As, however, such reparation would have deprived him of a decent pretext for war before the end of the armistice, he was careful to estimate the damages at one million six hundred thousand crowns, a sum which he knew could not be raised. While the English envoys were offering excuses and remonstrances, Pont de l'Arche, a May fortress within twelve miles of Rouen, was surprised by 16. a small band of adventurers, and a proposal was made to exchange it for Fougères. This might have been accepted; but the indemnification of sixteen hundred thousand crowns was still demanded and refused; and the king and the duke of Bretagne resolved to unite their forces, and sweep the English from the soil of France. 1449. A. D. The campaign opened with the surprisal of Verneuil July through the treachery of a townsman: soon afterwards 29. Dunois, commonly called the bastard of Orleans, took the command; and within two months one half of Normandy was in his possession. The duke of Somerset, surrounded with disaffection and treason, unable to face the enemy in the field, and forbidden to hope for assistance from England, was compelled to shut himself up in the capital, and to behold from the walls of the castle the fall of the fortresses around him. Encouraged by his correspondents within the city, Dunois approached with his army: at the end of three days he decamped, was recalled by his friends, and had the satisfaction to see the walls scaled by his men between two towers, 16. Oct. which had been intrusted to the care of the citizens. Rouen would that day have been taken had not Talbot hastened with his banner to the spot, hurled the enemy into the ditch, and put the guards to the sword. But a garrison of twelve hundred men could not protect an extensive and populous city against a powerful army without, and a still more dangerous enemy within. The duke with a guard of sixty men was surrounded in the

Oct. street by more than eight hundred armed citizens, who
 18. extorted his assent to their proposal of treating with Charles. It was agreed between the archbishop and the king that Rouen should open its gates, that the English should retire with all their effects, and that such as should prefer it might remain unmolested. The duke, however, refused these terms, and was besieged by the citizens and the French troops in the citadel. After two fruitless attempts to obtain the conditions which had been rejected, he consented to pay fifty-six thousand francs, to surrender most of the fortresses in the district of Caux for his ransom and that of his companions, and to deliver Talbôt and several other knights as hostages for the faithful performance of his engagements *.

Nov.

At length, the English ministry made a feeble attempt to succour the duke, who had fixed his head-quarters at Caen; and sir Thomas Kyriel, having landed 1450. with three thousand men, and drawn about an equal number from the neighbouring garrisons, marched forward to join that commander. But near Fourmigni he was intercepted by the earl of Clermont; and after a contest of three hours his men were alarmed by the arrival of a new army under the constable of France. Some saved themselves by flight: the rest, after a bloody resistance, were either slain or made prisoners. As this was the first victory which, for many years, had been gained over the English in the open field, the account was industriously circulated throughout France, and was everywhere received with the loudest acclamations of joy. Avranches, Bayeux, Valonges, immediately opened their gates; the duke was besieged in Caen; June the town, after several breaches had been made, surren-

 July unless it were relieved within a certain period. Cher-

days, Normandy, with its seven bishoprics, and one hundred fortresses, was entirely recovered by the French monarch*.

Charles, however, was not satisfied with the conquest of Normandy: the moment Cherbourg surrendered, his army began its march towards Guienne. The inhabitants were by principle attached to the descendant of their ancient dukes: but the absence of succour, and the pressure of immediate danger, induced the most opulent to submit, as the only means of preserving their honours and property. Not a man was sent from England for the protection of the duchy; not a battle was fought to expel the invaders; not a governor defended his charge against the enemy. Uniformly each fortress, as soon as a respectable force made its appearance, was surrendered. Before Christmas all the territory on the banks of the Dordogne had fallen into the possession of Charles: by the following August the French banner waved in triumph, from the mouth of the Garonne to the very borders of Spain. When nothing but Calais ^{A.D.} 1451 remained to England, Charles offered to treat of peace. The proposal was rejected with an idle threat, that Henry would never sheath his sword till he should have reconquered all that had been lost†.

The public mind had been sufficiently exasperated by the cession of Maine and Anjou: but when that cession was followed by the invasion of Normandy; when each messenger brought fresh accounts of the rapid progress of the enemy; every tongue was employed in bewailing the fallen glory of England, and every place resounded with cries of vengeance on the head of the minister. He was described as the queen's minion, who, to please a foreign mistress, did not hesitate to betray his sovereign, and to sacrifice the inheritance of the crown. To him were attributed the release of the duke of Orleans, the death of the duke of Gloucester, the poverty of the

- treasury, and all the calamities which had befallen the English arms on the continent. In this state of public opinion a parliament had been called to provide for the defence of Normandy : but it had hardly assembled, when the news of the loss of Rouen arrived to inflame the discontent of the people, and to multiply the embarrassments of the government. Six weeks were spent in violent but useless altercation ; and nothing more was concluded before the holidays than to send sir Thomas Kyriel with a small force to the aid of the duke of Somerset. But during the recess two events occurred which foreboded the ruin of Suffolk. One evening William Tailbois was discovered lurking with several armed men near the door of the council chamber. It was in vain that the favourite took him under his protection. Tailbois was committed to the Tower at the requisition of the lord Cromwell, the most active among the enemies of the minister ; was tried on a charge of plotting the death of that nobleman, and was condemned to pay him damages to the amount of three thousand pounds*. Soon afterwards the bishop of Chichester, keeper of the privy seal, proceeded to Portsmouth to pay the soldiers and sailors engaged for the expedition : but it was no sooner known that he was the man who had delivered Maine to the French king, than the populace rose, and the prelate lost his life in the tumult†. Whether it was that this prelate sought to divert their indignation from himself, or that the story was invented by the opponents of Suffolk, he is said to have declared before his death that the favourite was a traitor, who had sold Maine to the enemy, and had boasted of having as much influence in the French as in the English council. It was thought necessary that the duke (he had lately been raised to that dignity) should notice this report ; and, as soon as the parliament assembled after the recess, rising in his place, he besought the king to recollect that his father had died in the service of his country at Harfleur, his elder brother had fallen in the battle of Azincourt, his second and third brothers had perished at Jargeau, and his youngest brother had expired a hostage in France; that he himself had been a knight of the garter thirty years, had spent thirty-four years in arms, during one half of which time he had never visited his native country; that he had been fifteen years sworn of the king's council; that he was born in England; that his inheritance, and the inheritance of his children and posterity, lay in this country. Was it then possible, he asked, that for any promises of an enemy he could become a traitor? "Whereupon," he added, "I beseech your highness in the most humble wise I can bethink, that if any man will charge me with the report aforesaid, or any other thing against your royal person and land, he may come forth, and say to me in these matters what he wills; and that in your presence, my sovereign lord, I may be heard in my excusations and defences reasonable, the which I trust shall be so open and so plain, that your highness and your land shall be content of me; for God knoweth I am, and shall be, and never was other but true to you, sovereign lord, and to your land." At his request the speech was entered on the rolls*.

But by this time his enemies in the lower house had formed themselves into a powerful party, which was entirely, though secretly, guided by the counsels of the lord Cromwell†. Four days after the duke had so solemnly Jan. declared his innocence, a deputation from the commons 26. requested, that since, according to his own confession, he lay under the suspicion of treason, he might be immediately committed to the Tower. But the lords, having consulted the judges, replied that they had no power to order any peer into confinement, unless some specific Jan. charge were brought against him. Two days later the 28.

speaker returned, and accused him of having furnished the castle of Wallingford with stores and provisions for the purpose of aiding the king of France, who, he pretended, was then making preparations to invade the country. On this incredible and ridiculous charge he was arrested, and confined in the Tower. The archbishop of Canterbury immediately resigned the office of chancellor, which was given to the cardinal archbishop of York*.

Ten days were employed in framing the bill of impeachment, which, when it was finished, left the delinquency of the prisoner more problematical than before. Most, indeed, of our ancient writers, borne along by the torrent of popular prejudice, have pronounced him guilty; but the improbability or insufficiency of the eight articles of treason alleged against him will establish his innocence in the mind of the impartial reader. The

Feb. 7. first, and therefore we may suppose the most important charge, was, that he had plotted to dethrone the king, and place the crown on the head of his own son, whom for that purpose he intended to marry to the only daughter of the late duke of Somerset, that he might be allied to the royal family; and that for this purpose he had solicited the aid of the French king. Next followed the usual charges of his having liberated the duke of Orleans against the opinion of the council, and surrendered Maine and Anjou without consulting his colleagues; and the weakness of these accusations was bolstered up with vague assertions, that he had betrayed the king's secrets, and conveyed intelligence to the king's enemies. Sensible, however, of their inability to prove these eight

Mal. 7. articles, the commons a month afterwards sent to the lords a new impeachment, in which the duke was charged with misprision of treason under sixteen heads, by improvident waste of the public money; by diverting the supplies from the purposes for which they had been originally voted; by advising the king to impoverish himself by unnecessary grants; by bestowing offices under the crown on suspicious or disloyal persons; and by screening from the pursuit of justice a notorious outlaw, named William Tailbois. The duke was now removed from his prison to a tower in the garden of the palace, that he might be nearer the parliament*.

On the day appointed for his answer he was introduced into the house of lords, and falling on his knees before the king, solemnly declared his innocence. To ^{Mar.} the first article he replied that it was ridiculous and impossible, and appealed to several of the peers present, who knew that he had intended to marry his son to a daughter of the earl of Warwick. For the cession of Anjou and Maine, if it were a crime, he was not more responsible than the other lords of the council, or the other peers of the parliament; since the first had authorised, the second had approved the measure. The remaining charges, he contended, were frivolous and vexatious, resting on no other proof than the reports raised by his enemies, or on acts of the council, emanating from many of his judges equally with himself. The second impeachment he did not notice†.

But whatever might be the guilt or innocence of Suffolk, it was evident that his enemies thirsted for his blood; nor would the commons grant any supply till their cry for vengeance had been appeased. It became therefore the policy of the court to devise the means of satisfying them without endangering his life. He was again called before the king and lords; and the chancellor, ^{Mar.} observing that he had not claimed the privilege of the peer-17. age, asked if he had any thing more to say in his defence. It was his hope, he replied, that he had sufficiently established his innocence; he had shown that the charges against him were false, and some of them impossible; he had denied the facts, the times, the places, and the conversations; he repeated that he was as ignorant of them as "the child still in the mother's womb," and therefore threw himself without reserve on the will of his sovereign. The chancellor immediately resumed "Sir, since you do not put yourself on your peerage for trial, the king will not hold you either guilty or innocent of the treasons with which you have been charged: but with respect to the second impeachment, not as a judge advised by the lords, but as one to whose control you have voluntarily submitted, he commands you to quit this land before the first of May, and forbids you ever to set your foot during the five next years on his dominions either in this kingdom or beyond the sea." The lords immediately protested by the mouth of the constable, the viscount Beaumont, that this was the act of the king alone, and should form no precedent to bar them or their heirs of the privilege of the peerage. The parliament was soon afterwards prorogued, to meet again in a month's time in the city of Leicester*.

During these proceedings the public mind had been kept in a continual ferment; and, as soon as the king's decision was published, the most incredible reports were circulated, inflammatory libels were affixed to the doors of the churches, and the life of the duke was openly threatened†. To intercept him on his discharge from confinement two thousand persons assembled in St. Giles's: but though they surprised his servants, the object of their hatred fortunately escaped, and proceeded to his estates in the county of Suffolk‡. On the day fixed for his departure he assembled the knights and esquires of the neighbourhood, and in their presence swore on the sacrament that he was innocent of the crimes with which he had been charged by his enemies *. At the same time he wrote to his son a most eloquent and affectionate letter, laying down rules for his conduct, and inculcating in the most forcible terms the duty of piety towards God, loyalty to the king, and obedience to his mother†. Whoever has read this affecting composition will find it difficult to persuade himself that the writer could have been either a false subject or a bad man‡. He sailed from Ipswich with two small vessels, and sent a pinnace before him to inquire whether he might be permitted to land in the harbour of Calais. But the pinnace was captured by a squadron of men of Apr. war; and immediately the Nicholas of the Tower, one 30. of the largest ships in the navy, bore down on the duke's vessels. He was ordered on board, and received on deck by the captain with the ominous salutation of "Welcome, traitor." It is probable that a messenger was sent on shore to announce his capture, and require instructions; for the duke remained two nights in the Nicholas, during which he spent much of his time in conversation with his confessor, wrote a long letter to the king, and underwent a mock trial before the sailors, by whom he was condemned to suffer death. On the May second morning a small boat came alongside, in which 2. were a block, a rusty sword, and an executioner: the duke was lowered into it; and the man, telling him that he should die like a knight, at the sixth stroke smote off his head. His remains were placed on the sands near Dover, and watched by the sheriff of Kent, till the king ordered them to be delivered to his widow, by whom they were interred in the collegiate church of Wingfield in Suffolk §.

From the preceding narrative it is evident that there existed a party which had sworn the destruction of this unfortunate nobleman. Not deterred by the failure of the prosecution in parliament, nor by the escape of their victim from St. Giles's, they even despatched an armed force to assassinate him at sea. But of the leaders of this party we know no more than that they were persons of the first consideration in the state; and of their immediate motives we are entirely ignorant. By some writers the murder has been attributed to disappointed ambition, which could not brook the ascendancy of the favourite in the councils of his sovereign: by others to the policy of the duke of York, who deemed it necessary to remove so faithful a minister before he should openly take any measure to place himself on the throne. The last hypothesis has been thought to derive confirmation from the fact, that some of the noblemen, who afterwards espoused his interests, came to the parliament at Leicester, accompanied by hundreds of armed men*.

The news of this tragical event plunged the king and queen into the deepest distress: in a few days they were awakened from their sorrow by the danger which threatened themselves. Whether the men who had taken the life of Suffolk had any part in kindling this flame which now burst forth, or whether it sprung spontaneously from the irritation of the public mind, it is difficult to determine. Intelligence had just arrived of the defeat of sir Thomas Kyriel; the commons in several counties threatened to rise and reform the government; and the people of Kent were goaded to madness by repeated rumours of the signal vengeance which Henry had determined to inflict on them for having furnished the ships which intercepted his friend. It was a crisis men; and an Irish adventurer, whose real name was John Cade, but who had assumed that of Mortimer, cousin to the duke of York, seized the moment to unfurl the standard of insurrection. At the head of twenty thousand men he marched to Blackheath. Henry instantly dissolved the parliament, and summoning his forces, advanced to London*. Many messages passed between the king and the feigned Mortimer, who delivered the wishes of his followers in two papers, entitled

"The Complaints of the Commons of Kent," and "The Requests by the Captain of the great Assembly in Kent." The complaints stated that the king purposed to punish the men of Kent for a murder of which they were not guilty; that he gave away the revenues of the crown, and took for his own maintenance the goods of the people; that he excluded from his council the lords of his own blood, to make place for men of low rank, who oppressed his subjects; that the sheriffs, under-sheriffs, and collectors of taxes, were guilty of intolerable extortions; that in the election of knights of the shire the free choice of the people was superseded by the influence of the lords; and that numerous delays and impediments had been introduced to prevent the speedy administration of justice. Their "requests" demanded, that the relatives of the duke of Suffolk should be banished from the court, and the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, with the earls and barons, be employed about the king's person; that the traitors should be punished who contrived the death of the duke of Gloucester, of the holy father the cardinal, of the duke of Exeter, and of the duke of Warwick, and who occasioned the loss of Normandy, Guienne, Anjou, and Maine; and that all extortions should be abolished, and the great extortioners, Sleg, Cromer, Lisle, and Robert Est, be brought to justice†.

 June 24. news was brought to Blackheath, the royalists began to waver: the requests of the Kentish men they now thought reasonable; and it was asked why they should fight against their own countrymen, who had taken up arms in defence of the national liberties. At the persuasion of the lords, who distrusted, or pretended to distrust, the fidelity of their followers, Henry sent to the Tower his chamberlain the lord Say, one of the most obnoxious ministers, disbanded his forces, and retired to the castle

On the third day a few houses were pillaged; and the citizens fearing the same violence on the next morning, determined with the assistance of lord Scales to defend the bridge and exclude the insurgents. Cade received July intelligence of their design, and a bloody conflict ensued during the night: sometimes the citizens, sometimes the men of Kent prevailed: but at the end of six hours, the royalists were in possession of the bridge, and a short truce was taken by mutual consent. The archbishops of Canterbury and York, who were in the Tower, deemed this a favourable moment to divide the insurgents; and the bishop of Winchester crossing the river, carried with him pardons under the great seal for all who should immediately return to their own homes†. Cade, however, July repenting of his credulity, again unfurled his banner, 8. and found men prepared to rejoin it. But their number was too small to attack the city: they retired from Southwark through Deptford to Rochester, and there quarrelled among themselves respecting the partition of their plunder. During his absence the interests of the duke had been intrusted to the care of his friends : now it was deemed time that he should appear on the scene in person. Leaving his government of Ireland without permission, he landed in England, and, to the terror of the court, hastened towards London with a retinue of four thousand men. On his road through Northamptonshire he sent for William Tresham, the speaker of the late house of commons, a partisan who had distinguished himself by his zeal in the prosecution of Suffolk : but Tresham had hardly left his own home, when he was intercepted and murdered by a party of armed men belonging to the lord Grey of Ruthyn, probably in revenge of the part which he had acted in procuring the death of the late minister. York pursued his journey, was introduced to Henry, behaved with insolence in his presence, extorted a promise that he would summon a parliament, and in the interval be-

Oct. He was scarcely gone, when the duke of Somerset returned from France. The king and queen hailed his arrival as a blessing. He was the nearest of kin to Henry‡, and it was hoped that his fidelity and services would prove a counterpoise to the ambition of Richard. among those who were supposed to have sold to the enemy the inheritance of the crown*.

The session of parliament was unquiet and stormy. Now The rival leaders boldly opposed each other; and, though⁶. the life of Somerset was threatened, though his treasures were pillaged by the populace, his opponents could not obtain any decided advantage. Young, one of the members for Bristol, moved that, as Henry was without children, the duke of York should be declared heir apparent: but the motion met with very feeble support, and the mover was afterwards committed to the Tower†. A bill was carried through the lower house to attain the memory of the duke of Suffolk, and another to remove from the court the duke of Somerset, and the duchess of Suffolk, and most of the king's friends: but Henry refused his assent to the first‡, and replied to the other, that he could not dispense with the services of the lords, and a few others who had for years been near his person, but would order the rest to absent themselves for twelve months, during which their conduct might be investigated, if any charge could be brought against them§. At the same time the duchess of Suffolk, and the persons indicted of treason at the Guildhall during the insurrection, demanded to be brought to trial, and were instantly acquitted||.

The other princes mentioned in Cade's memorial were, the duke of Warwick, who was descended from Edmund Langley duke of York, and died 11th June, 1445; cardinal Beaufort, who died April 11th, 1447; and Holand duke of Exeter, who had married the grand-daughter of the duke of Gloucester, and died 5th of August 1447.

determination to appeal to the sword on the first favourable occasion*. For several months the nation was agitated by quarrels between the adherents of the two parties, by acts of violence and bloodshed, and by fruitless attempts to effect a reconciliation†. At length the duke repaired to his castle at Ludlow; and while, under the pretext of opposing the pernicious projects of the duke of Somerset, he raised the tenants of the house of Mortimer in the marches of Wales, published a proclamation containing strong professions of loyalty, and offered to swear fealty to Henry on the sacrament before the bishop of Hereford, and the earl of Shrewsbury. The king at the head of an army immediately marched against him: but York, avoiding the direction of the royalists, advanced to London by a different road, and finding the gates shut against him, proceeded as far as Dartford, in the hope of alluring to his standard the men of Kent. Henry followed him, and from Blackheath sent the bishops of Winchester and Ely to demand an explanation of his conduct. The duke's answer began with the usual protestation of his loyalty; he then complained that both before his departure to Ireland, and since his return to England, attempts had been made to arrest him for treason; and concluded with asserting

* He had married Cecily, daughter of Nevil, earl of Westmoreland, and grand daughter of John of Ghent. This marriage secured to him the services of the earl of Salisbury, and the lords Falconberg, Bergavenny, and Latimer, the brothers of his wife. He was also supported by the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Devon, and the lords Cromwell and Cobham.

† I have omitted in the text the three principal events of the year, as, in our ignorance of their causes, it is difficult to connect them together. 1. In the spring the earl of Devon besieged the castle of Taunton, held by the lord Bouville, a royalist. The duke of York joined the earl, and Bouville surrendered. Wyrcest. 475. 2. In August, Thomas Nevil, son of the earl of Salisbury, married a niece of lord Cromwell. In returning from the marriage, Percy lord Egremont quarrelled with the earl of Salisbury near York. It was, says the writer, the commencement of the greatest calamities to England. Id. p. 476. 3. A great council was held at Coventry. Several men were killed in an affray between the servants of Somerset and the armed townsmen. It was proposed to arrest the duke of York. The duke of Buckingham, a staunch loyalist, prevented it. It was agreed that all differences should be left to the decision of the peers. Id. 476. Fenn's Letters, i. 26. The editor appears to me to have affixed to this letter a wrong date.

that he was come to vindicate his innocence, and set the question at rest for ever. The king in reply reminded him, that since he had unlawfully slain the bishop of Chichester*, his adherents had openly boasted of his pretended claim to the succession, whence it was not surprising if the advisers of the crown should occasionally adopt measures of precaution: but added, that to set his mind at ease on that subject, he still held him to be a true and faithful subject, and his own well-beloved cousin. York now demanded that all persons "noised" or indicted of treason should be apprehended and imprisoned in the Tower till they could be brought to trial; and the king replied that a new council should be appointed, in which he should be included, and that all matters in debate should be decided by the majority of that council†. To satisfy him, however, he ordered the duke of Somerset into custody; on which York disbanded his army, and submitted to visit Henry in his tent unarmed and bare-headed. There the two rivals met; the charge of treason was retorted from one to the other; and the duke, as he left the king, was immediately arrested. Had the advice of Somerset been followed, he would have been brought to his trial, or terrified into a confession, and executed. But Henry recoiled from the idea of shedding the blood of a relation: the report, that the earl of March was advancing with an army to liberate his father, intimidated the council, and an offer of his liberty was made to him on condition that he would again swear fealty to the king. He took the oath on the sacrament, in St. Paul's, before the lords and a numerous audience, and was permitted to retire to his castle at Wigmore‡.

At this moment, when Henry was relieved from all apprehension of a contest for the throne, arrived a deputation from the inhabitants of Guienne, who, impatient under the load of taxation imposed upon them, by their new sovereign, offered to renew their allegiance, and solicited the aid of an English army. The invitation was accepted with eagerness, and the command given to Talbot, the veteran earl of Shrewsbury, who had reached his eightieth year. With four thousand men he sailed to Guienne; his son lord Lisle brought him a reinforcement of an equal number; and before winter Bordeaux, with the whole of the Bordelais, and Chatillon in Perigord, had submitted. The next spring he opened the campaign with the capture of the town of Fronsac: but there the tide of victory turned; the French marshals Loheac and Jalagnes advanced with twenty-two thousand men; and the count of Penthievre invested the important fortress of Chatillon. Talbot hastened to its relief: early in the morning he surprised and defeated a numerous body of the enemy: but the fugitives gave the alarm, and the French retired into an intrenched camp lined with three hundred pieces of cannon*. Talbot, yielding to the ardour of his followers, ordered an assault; and his opponents were seen to waver, when the count of Penthievre, arriving with a new body of men, determined the fate of the battle. The English commander, who had his horse killed under him, and his leg broken, was slain as he lay on the field, with a bayonet; his son, though repeatedly urged to retire, fell in attempting to rescue his father; and the army, after the death of its leader, dispersed in every direction. A thousand men, who had fought their way into the fortress, were made prisoners.

From Chatillon Charles, who now took the command, pursued his victorious career till he reached the gates of Bordeaux. That city was obstinately defended by six thousand armed citizens, and four thousand English: but famine-compelled them to surrender after a siege of seven weeks, on condition that the English should retire with all their property, and the natives with a few exceptions should be received under the protection of the conqueror. From that moment Guienne was incorporated with the dominions of the French monarch*.

While the nation was intoxicated with joy caused by Mar. the first success of Talbot, Henry summoned a parliament, which, besides liberal supplies of money, voted an army of twenty thousand archers to be raised and paid at the expense of the several counties†. It had been intended that the king should put himself at the head of this force: but the design was at first postponed, and ultimately abandoned on account of the declining state of his health. If that circumstance raised, another occurred to lower the hopes of the Yorkists. In autumn the queen was delivered of a son, whom she called Edward. Oct. 13. It was in vain that the king's enemies attempted to throw doubts on the legitimacy of the young prince. Their suspicions were silenced by the concurrent voice of the nation; and the prospect of an undisputed succession was hailed with joy by the friends of tranquillity‡.

Unfortunately, however, Henry by this time had sunk into a state of mental, as well as bodily incapacity§. His melancholy situation, which could not be concealed, rendered it necessary to prorogue the parliament, and recalled the duke of York into the cabinet. He soon Nov. gained the ascendancy over his rival, and Somerset was 25.

 1454. assembled, he opened the session in the king's name,
 Feb. with the title of his lieutenant. The commons had al-
 14. ready shown themselves stedfastly attached to the royal cause: but the duke had contrived to throw into prison their speaker, Thomas Thorpe, one of the barons of the exchequer. In an action for trespass (whether it were real or feigned is unknown) he had obtained a verdict in his own favour with damages to the amount of one thousand pounds; and Thorpe had been committed to the Fleet, till he should give security for that sum, and
 Feb. pay a proportional fine to the crown. It was in vain
 16. that the commons petitioned for the release of their speaker; the lords refused their assent; and a new speaker was chosen†. From the confused order and imperfect nature of the notices entered on the rolls, it is
 Feb. difficult to collect the proceedings of this session of par-
 28. liament. It appears that many of the lords had absent-ed themselves, and were compelled to attend by heavy Mar. fines‡. The lord Cromwell obtained an act to bind the 9. duke of Exeter to keep the peace under a severe penalty§; and the earl of Devonshire, another of the Yorkists, having been charged with treason, was tried and acquit-
 Mar. ted by his peers. The duke, conceiving that the accu-

A committee of peers was now chosen to visit the king; and as soon as they had reported that he was incapable of transacting business, an act was passed appointing the duke protector with a yearly salary of two thousand marks. The Lancastrians, however, had sufficient Mar. influence to preserve the king's rights inviolate. It was 27. declared, agreeably to former precedents, that the title of protector imported no authority; that it merely gave the precedence in the council, and the command of the army in time of invasion or rebellion; that it was revocable at the will of the king; that it should not prejudice the rights of his son, who had already been created prince of Wales and earl of Chester; and that, if Henry's incapacity were permanent, the protectorate should devolve on the prince, as soon as he came of age †. Each of the large ships had a captain, who was a knight, besides a master. The barges and balyngers had also masters. The expense of provisions for each man was estimated at two-pence the day, his pay at two shillings the month. The masters had in addition a reward of 3s. 4d. per month. The ships were to be on the sea from Candlemas to Martinmas; and in case they made any captures, the value was to be divided into two halves, of which one belonged to the masters, quarter-masters, shipmen and soldiers; the other was to be subdivided into three equal parts, of which two were to be given to the owners of the ships, barges, balyngers, and pinnaces, and one to the captains, by whom it was to be apportioned into eight shares, two for the commander-in-chief, and one for each of the others. Somerset, and bestowed on the duke of York for the same period *.

The king's malady was not permanent. About Christmas he recovered his health, and with it the use of his reason †. Though he received the duke of York with his usual kindness, he put an end to the protectorate, and liberated the duke of Somerset from the Tower.

A. D. At first that nobleman gave bail for his appearance at 1455. Westminster to answer the charges laid against him:

York, however, had no intention to await that award, but took the first opportunity to retire from court, invited his friends to meet him in the marshes of Wales, and soon saw himself at the head of three thousand men, with the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Salisbury, and his son the celebrated earl of Warwick. At the news Henry a neighbouring field ; and, after a pause of three hours, sent a message to the king with strong professions of attachment and loyalty, but demanding the immediate surrender of Somerset and his associates, and declaring that they would die themselves, or pursue their enemies to the death. Henry refused with firmness, declaring that, " sooner than abandon any of the lords who were " faithful to him, he was ready that day in their quarrel " to live and die *." Though the barriers at the entrance of the town were gallantly defended by the lord Clifford, Warwick forced his way through the gardens into the street, and his followers rent the air with shouts of A Warwick ! a Warwick ! At the sound alarm spread among the royalists ; the barriers were abandoned ; the Yorkists poured through the opening ; and the victory was won.

Henry had taken refuge in the house of a tanner, where the duke immediately visited him. He bent his knee with apparent humility, bade the king rejoice that the traitor (meaning Somerset) had met with his desert, and, taking him by the hand, led him first to the shrine of St. Alban, and then to his apartment in the abbey. The battle seems to have been won by the archers. Henry was wounded in the neck, the duke of Buckingham and lord Dudley in the face, the earl of Stafford in the arm, all of them with arrows. The duke of Somerset, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford were slain ; and, as soon as they fell, their men threw down their arms and fled †. Some writers tell us that the slain amounted to many thousands : but a letter written three days after the battle reduces it to six score, and sir William Stonor, at that time steward of the abbey, seems to make the number still smaller ‡.

The king, affecting to give credit to this incredible tale, acquitted York, Warwick, and Salisbury, of all disloyal practices, pronounced them good and faithful subjects, and granted them a full pardon for all offences committed before

Two days later they renewed their request, adding, that till it was granted they should suspend the consideration of every other subject. As soon as they left the house, the lords conjured the duke of York to undertake the charge; but he, with affected humility, alleging his own incapacity, and solicited them to select from their body a peer more worthy of the honour, and more equal to the burden. They in return renewed their prayer with many compliments to his abilities and wisdom. When this farce had been acted for a considerable time, he condescended to accept the protectorate, but on condition that it should not be, as before, revocable "at the will of the king, but by the king in parliament, with the advice and assent of the lords spiritual and temporal *." Still the powers of government were vested, not in him, but in the members of the council: but this provision was intended merely to blind the eyes of the nation; for he had previously secured a majority in the council, and the office of chancellor, and the government of Calais, were bestowed on his associates, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick †.

to exchange his present for a still higher title. But the meek and inoffensive character of Henry had preserved him friends, who were unwilling that he should be stripped of his authority; and the lofty spirit of the queen sought every opportunity to oppose the rival pretensions of the Yorkists. When the parliament met after the holidays, Henry had recovered his health. To strengthen his party York had called sir Thomas Stanley and sir Richard West to the house of peers: but the current ran in the king's favour: Henry proceeded in person to the parliament, and the protector's commission was formally revoked*.

With apparent willingness the duke descended from his high station; the earl of Salisbury resigned the great seal; and the offices of government were again filled by the king's friends. Two years passed without any important occurrence: but they were years of distrust and alarm; the relatives of the lords slain at St. Alban's loudly demanded vengeance; and their adversaries surrounded themselves with bands of armed and trusty retainers. Henry called a great council at Coventry, and by the mouth of his chancellor repeatedly communicated his complaints and intentions to the duke of York. At length the duke of Buckingham, as speaker of the house, rehearsed all the real or supposed offences with which that prince had been charged; and at the conclusion, the peers falling on their knees, besought the king to declare that he would never more "show grace" to the duke or any other person, who should oppose the rights of the crown, or disturb the peace of the realm. Henry assented; and York repeated his oath of fealty, and gave a copy of it under his own signature to the king. The same was exacted from the earl of Warwick. In conclusion, all the lords bound themselves never for the future to seek redress by force, but to remit their quarrels to the justice of their sovereign†.

In consequence of this resolution Henry, who had long acted as the only impartial man in his dominions, laboured to mitigate the resentments of the two parties; and at last had reason to hope that his endeavours would be crowned with complete success. By common agreement they repaired with their retainers to London : the royalists were lodged without, the Yorkists within the walls; and the mayor, at the head of five thousand armed citizens, undertook to preserve the peace. The duke assembled his partisans every morning at the Black Friars: their resolves were communicated by the primate and other prelates to the royalists, who met at the White Friars every afternoon; and the proceedings of the day were in the evening laid before the king, who with several of the judges resided at Berkhamstead. At length, as umpire between them, he pronounced his award; that within the two following years a chantry should be founded at the expense of the duke of York, and the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, for the souls of the three lords slain in battle at St. Alban's; that both those who were dead, and the lords who had been the cause of their death, should be reputed faithful subjects; that the duke of York should pay to the dowager duchess of Somerset and her children the sum of five thousand, and the earl of Warwick to the lord Clifford that of one thousand marks; and that the earl of Salisbury should release to Percy lord Egremont all the damages he had obtained against him for an assault, on condition that the said lord Egremont should enter into a sufficient recognizance to keep the peace for ten years †. walked in procession to St. Paul's. In token of their reconciliation the queen was conducted by the duke of York; and the lords of each party walked before them arm in arm as friends and brothers. To the beholders it was a spectacle which appeared to promise harmony and peace: but no external ceremony could extinguish the passions of ambition and revenge, which yet lay smouldering in their breasts.

The king a short time before had taken the custody of the sea from the duke of Exeter, and given it to the earl of Warwick for a term of five years. His object probably was to attach that enterprising nobleman to the throne, or to remove him to a distance from his associates. In May intelligence was brought to Calais, that a strange fleet of twenty-eight sail had been met at sea; and Warwick, with his characteristic intrepidity, hastened to intercept it with only five large and seven small vessels. The battle lasted from four in the morning till ten; and the English, though they had captured six sail, were compelled to retire with considerable loss into Calais†. The fleet, or at least the merchandise, belonged to the citizens of Lubeck, whose commerce had been hitherto conducted under the faith of treaties with England. On the complaint of the sufferers a commission was appointed to inquire into the causes of the engagement; and Warwick was in consequence summoned to attend the council at Westminster‡. One day, as he left the court, a quarrel arose between one of his livery and one of the king's servants: the affray gradually became more alarming; and the earl believed, or affected to believe, that his life was in danger. He hastened into the north to consult his father the earl of Salisbury and the duke of York; and having settled with them the plan of his future operations, returned to his command at Calais*.

The winter was passed in preparations for the subsequent contest. The three lords actively solicited the aid of their partisans; and Warwick in particular called under his banner the veterans who had served in the late wars in Normandy and Guienne. The court distributed with profusion collars of white swans, the badge of the young prince, and by letters under the privy seal invited the king's friends to meet him in arms in the city of Leicester†. The dissension was no longer confined to the higher classes: it divided almost every family in the nation; it had penetrated into the convents of the monks, and the cottages of the poor. One party maintained that the duke of York was an injured prince, who with his associates was trampled under foot by the minions of the court, and was compelled to arm in order to preserve his own life: the other pronounced him a traitor, who under false pretences sought to place himself on the throne, and who owed to the king's clemency that life which he had already forfeited to the laws‡. The greater part of the summer passed without any important event. At last the earl of Salisbury moved from his castle of Middleham to join the duke of York on the borders of Wales. The lord Audley with ten thousand men interposed himself between them at Bloreheath in Staffordshire. Salisbury, whose force was small, pre-Sept. tended to fly; the royalists pursued in confusion; and, 23. as soon as one half of them had crossed a rapid torrent, the fugitives turned, fell on the pursuers in the glen, and obtained with ease a complete victory. Audley with more than two thousand men remained on the field of battle: the Lord Dudley with many knights and esquires was made prisoner. The earl led his troops without further molestation to Ludlow, where he found the duke of York, and was in a few days joined by his son from Calais with a large body of veterans under sir John Blount and sir Andrew Trollop *.

- The king with an army of sixty thousand men lay at Worcester, and had sent the bishop of Salisbury to his opponents with offers of reconciliation and pardon, if they would submit within six days. They replied that they had no reliance on his promises; that his friends, depending on their own favour, transgressed his commands; and that the earl of Warwick had the last year nearly lost his life by their treachery. He advanced
- Oct. 10. sent him a second message, declaring that, if they had taken up arms, it was solely in their own defence; that though they could have revenged themselves on their enemies, they had refrained through respect to him; and that even now, when they had retired to the very borders of his kingdom, they had determined not to draw the sword against their sovereign, unless they should be compelled by necessity †. The Yorkists were
- Oct. 13. intrenched behind several batteries of cannon, which played incessantly on the royal army. To keep up the spirits of his men, the duke had spread a report that Henry had died the day before, and in the morning had ordered mass to be chanted for the repose of his soul. But the same afternoon sir Andrew Trollop, marshal of the army, who, though attached to his sovereign, had hitherto been deceived by the fair speeches of the insurgents, discovered the real object of the duke. He did not hesitate a moment; but, taking with him his veterans, departed to offer his services to the king. Distrust and consternation instantly spread through the camp; and the confederate lords about midnight fled
- Nov. 2. with precipitation into the heart of Wales. There they separated, York with one of his sons sailing to Ireland, the rest accompanying Warwick into Devonshire, whence he made his way back to Calais *.

This bloodless victory was most gratifying to the merciful disposition of Henry, who the next morning granted an amnesty to the insurgents abandoned by their leaders, and convoked a parliament to meet at Coventry. Its principal employment was to pass an act of attainder against the duke and duchess of York, and their Nov. children the earls of March and Rutland, against the 20. earl and countess of Salisbury, and their son the earl of Warwick, the lord Clinton, and a few other knights and esquires†. It was with pain that Henry acquiesced in this act of severity. When it was read before him preparatory to the dissolution, he insisted on the addition of a clause enabling him to dispense with the attainder, whenever he should think proper, and refused his assent to that part of it which confiscated the property of the lord Powis and two others, who had thrown themselves on his mercy the morning after the flight of their leaders‡.

In this desperate situation the hopes and fortunes of the Yorkists rested on the abilities and popularity of the earl of Warwick, who by a most fatal error had been permitted to retain the command of the fleet with the government of Calais. He was now superseded in both; in the former by the duke of Exeter, in the latter by the duke of Somerset. But when Somerset prepared to enter the harbour, he was driven back by the fire from the batteries; and as soon as he had landed at Guisnes, his ships were carried off by his own mariners to their favourite commander at Calais. They were a most valuable acquisition to Warwick, who while Somerset and 1460 his veterans were uselessly detained in Guisnes, sur- June prised two successive armaments fitted out by the royalists in the ports of Kent. He sailed even to Dublin to concert measures with the duke of York, and in his return was met by the duke of Exeter: but that commander, alarmed at symptoms of disaffection in his fleet, turned into Dartmouth, and Warwick rejoined his friends in Calais*.

The result of the conference at Dublin was soon disclosed. Emissaries were sent to all the friends of the party to hold themselves in readiness for action; and reports were spread that Henry had not given his assent to the act of attainder; that he was still convinced of the innocence of the exiles; and that, instead of being free, he was a reluctant captive in the hands of a faction. At the same time was circulated an appeal to the nation by the duke of York, enumerating all the grievances under which the people were said to labour; accusing the earls of Shrewsbury and Wiltshire and the lord Beaumont of guiding the king contrary to his own interests; complaining of the act of attainder against himself and his friends; asserting that letters had been sent to the French king to besiege Calais, and to the natives of Ireland to expel the English; and declaring that the fugitive lords were faithful subjects, and intended to prove their innocence before their sovereign†. This

June 5. manifesto was followed by the arrival of Warwick, who with fifteen hundred men landed in Kent, a county much attached to the house of York. He brought with him Coppini, bishop of Terni, who had been sent by Pius II. as legate to Henry, but had already sold himself to the king's enemies. In Kent Warwick was joined by the lord Cobham with four hundred followers, by the archbishop of Canterbury, who owed his dignity to the favor of the duke during the protectorate, and by most of the neighbouring gentlemen. As he advanced, his army swelled to the amount of twenty-five, some say to forty, thousand men; London asserted his loyalty upon oath, and prevailed on five of the bishops to accompany him, for the purpose of introducing him to his sovereign. The legate, at the same time, published to the clergy and people a letter which he had written to the king, vindicating the loyalty of the Yorkists. Henry had collected his army at Coventry, and advanced to Northampton, where he intrenched himself. Warwick, after three ineffectual attempts to obtain a conference with the king, gave to him notice to prepare for battle at two in the afternoon; and the legate, to animate his friends, not only excommunicated their enemies, but set up the papal banner in the field *. The royalists seemed confident of victory, but were betrayed by the lord Grey of Ruthyn, who, instead of defending his post, introduced the Yorkists into the heart of the camp. Though the combat lasted but a short time, the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewsbury, lord treasurer, the viscount Beaumont, the lord Egremont, with three hundred knights and gentlemen, were slain †; for it was the policy of Warwick to direct his followers to spare the people, but to refuse quarter to the nobility. Henry retired to his tent, where he received from the victors every demonstration of respect; his queen and her son fled towards Chester, and though they were rifled by their own servants, escaped into Wales, and thence after many adventures sailed to one of the Scottish ports ‡.

The captive monarch was conducted to London. But though he entered the capital in great pomp, the earl of Warwick riding bareheaded and carrying the sword before him, he was compelled to give the sanction of his authority to such measures as the victors proposed, to issue writs in approbation of the loyalty of those who had borne arms against him, and to call a parliament for the pretended purpose of healing the dissensions between the two parties. with a retinue of five hundred horsemen, and riding to Westminster, passed through the hall into the house, and stood for a short time with his hand on the throne. To the spectators he appeared to wait for an invitation to place himself on it. But every voice was silent. He turned and surveyed the assembly, when the primate ventured to ask him if he would visit the king, who was in the queen's apartment. "I know no one in this realm," he replied, "who ought not rather to visit me;" and leaving the house, appropriated to himself that part of the palace which had been usually reserved for the accommodation of the monarch*.

This was the first time that the duke had publicly advanced his claim: but though he was really in possession of the royal authority, the people were not prepared to deprive Henry of the crown. The meek and inoffensive character of the king strongly interested the feelings of men in his favor. His family had been seated on the throne for three generations; he had filled it himself thirty-nine years; most of his opponents owed their honours, many of them their estates to his bounty. York himself, on succeeding to the inheritance of the earl of March, from whom he claimed, had sworn fealty and done homage to Henry; when he accepted the government of Normandy, when he was appointed lieutenant in Ireland, when he was raised to the protectorate during the king's incapacity, he had, under his own seal and on the rolls of parliament, acknowledged him for his sovereign; and of late he had repeatedly sworn on the sacrament that he would be faithful to him, would maintain him on the throne, and would even augment, if it were possible, his royal dignity. On these accounts many of his adherents would never be persuaded that he intended to dethrone Henry; and when he made the attempt, he found his hopes unexpectedly checked by their apathy, and the murmurs of the people†.

How far this was true in the present instance we know not: it should, however, be observed that the sheriffs prayed for a bill of indemnity, not because they had made false returns, as some writers have imagined, but for having held the elections in obedience to the writ, after the year of their shrievalty was expired, contrary to the statute of the 23d of the king. On the ninth day of the session the duke of York by Oct. his counsel delivered to the bishop of Exeter, the new 16. chancellor, a statement of his claim to the crown, and requested that he might have a speedy answer. The lords resolved that, since every man who sued in that court, whether he were high or low, had a right to be heard, the duke's petition should be read, but that no answer should be returned without the previous command of the king. In this writing, having first derived his descent from Henry III., by Lionel third son to Edward III., he stated, that on the resignation of Richard II., Henry earl of Derby, the son of John of Ghent, the younger brother of the said Lionel, had, against all manner of right, entered on the crowns of England and France and the lordship of Ireland, which by law belonged to Roger Mortimer earl of March, great-grandson to the said sir Lionel; whence he concluded that of right, law, and custom, the said crown and lordship now belonged to himself, as the lineal representative of Roger Mortimer, in preference to any one who could claim only as the descendant of Henry earl of Derby*.

The next day Richard demanded an immediate an- Oct. swer, and the lords resolved to wait on the king, and 17. to receive his commands. Henry, when the subject was first opened to him, replied: "My father was king; his father was also king; I have worn the crown forty years from my cradle; you have all sworn fealty to me as your sovereign, and your fathers have done the like to my fathers. How then can my right be disputed?" In conclusion, he recommended his interests to their loyalty, and commanded them to "search for to find, in as much as in them was, all such things as might be objected and laid against the claim and title of the said duke." The lords the next day sent Oct. for the judges, and ordered them to defend to the best 18.

of their power the king's claims. They, however, demanded to be excused. By their office they were not to be of counsel between party and party, but to judge according to law of such matters as came before them: but the present question was above the law; it appertained not to them; it could be decided only by the lords of the king's blood and the high court of parliament. An order was then made for the attendance of the king's serjeants and attornies: they also presented their excuses, which, however, were not admitted, because by their office they were bound to give advice to the crown.

After several debates, in which each lord gave his opinion with apparent freedom, the following objections were sent to the duke: 1°. That both he and the lords had sworn fealty to Henry, and of course he by his oath was prevented from urging, they by theirs from admitting, his claim: 2°. That many acts, passed in divers parliaments of the king's progenitors, might be opposed to the pretensions of the house of Clarence, which acts "have been of authority to defeat any manner "of title:" 3°. That several entails had been made of the crown to the heirs male, whereas he claimed by descent from females: 4°. That he did not bear the arms of Lionel the third, but of Edmund, the fifth son of Edward III.; and, 5°. That Henry IV. had declared that he entered on the throne as the true heir of Henry III. To the three first objections the duke's counsel replied; that as priority of descent was evidently in his favour, it followed that the right to the crown was his; which right could not be defeated by oaths or acts of parliament, or entails. Indeed the only entail made to the exclusion of females was that of the seventh year of Henry IV., and would never have been thought of had that prince claimed under the customary law of descents; that the reason why he had not hitherto taken the arms of Lionel was the same as had prevented him from claiming the crown, the danger to which such a proceeding would have exposed him; and lastly, that, if Henry IV. pronounced himself the rightful heir of Henry III., he asserted what he knew to be untrue. As, however, the principal reliance of his adversaries was on the oaths which he had taken, and which it was contended were to be considered as a surrender of his right by his own act, he contended that no oath contrary to truth and justice is binding; that the virtue of an oath is to confirm truth and not to impugn it; and that as the obligation of oaths is a subject for the determination of the spiritual tribunals, he was willing to answer in any such court all manner of men, who should bring forward his oath in bar of his claim.

At length the lords resolved that the title of the duke of York could not be defeated; yet they refused to proceed to the next step of dethroning the king. To "save ^{Oct.} 24. "their oaths and clear their consciences," they proposed a compromise; that Henry should possess the crown for the term of his natural life, and that the duke and his heirs should succeed to it after Henry's death. To this both parties agreed. The duke and his two sons, the earls of March and Rutland, swore not to molest the king, but to maintain him on the throne; and Henry gave the royal assent to the bill declaring the duke heir apparent, allotting certain estates to him and his sons ^{Oct.} 31. on that account, and pronouncing any attempt against his person a crime of high treason. On the conclusion of this important affair the king with the crown on his head, and attended by the duke as heir apparent, rode in state to make his thanksgiving at St. Paul's*.

But though the unfortunate monarch had consented

* Rot. Parl. 375—383. From the history of this controversy, as it is entered on the rolls, it is plain that both the feelings and the opinions of the lords were in favour of Henry. The original defect in his descent had been supplied by the consent of the nation, the undisturbed possession of the crown by his family during sixty years, and the numerous oaths of fealty taken by all men, even his very competitor. No considerations could induce them to dethrone him; all that could be asserted from them by the victorious party was a compromise, which secured the crown to him during his life, and then took it from his son, to whom they had never sworn fealty, and gave it to another branch of the royal family.

- to surrender the interests of his son, they were still upheld by the queen, and the lords who had always adhered to the house of Lancaster. The earl of Northumberland, the lords Clifford, Dacres, and Neville, assembled an army at York; and the duke of Somerset and the earl of Devon joined them with their tenants from those counties. This union alarmed the victorious party :
- Dec. York and Salisbury hastened to anticipate their designs ;
- 2. and though Somerset surprised the vanguard of the Yorkists at Worksop, they reached before Christmas the strong castle of Sandal. Whether it were that the duke of York was compelled to send out strong parties to forage, or that his pride could not brook the taunts of his enemies, he fought them with inferior forces near Wakefield, and was either killed in the battle, or taken and beheaded on the spot. Two thousand of his men

But no one was more lamented than the earl of Rutland, who had only reached his eighteenth year *. Accompanied by one to whose care he had been entrusted, he fled from the conflict, but was stopped on the bridge of Wakefield. When he was asked his name, unable to speak through terror, he fell on his knees ; and his attendant, thinking to save him, said that he was the son of the duke. " Then," exclaimed Clifford, " as thy father slew mine, " so will I slay thee, and all of thy kin," and plunging his dagger into the breast of the young prince, bade the tutor go, and bear the news to the boy's mother. The queen on her arrival was presented with the head of her enemy, the duke, and ordered it to be encircled with a diadem of paper, and placed on the walls of York †.

each party a ferocity to which they had hitherto been strangers. Edward earl of March, and heir to the late duke of York, was at Gloucester when he received the melancholy intelligence of the fate of his father and brother; and having completed his levies, hastened to interpose an army between the royalists and the capital. He was closely followed by an inferior force of Welsh and Irish, under the king's uterine brother, Jasper earl of Pembroke: but, apprehensive of being surrounded, Feb. he suddenly faced about and obtained the bloody victory 2. of Mortimer's Cross, near Wigmore. The royalists are said to have lost about four thousand men. Pembroke himself escaped: but his father Owen Tudor was taken, and with Throgmorton and seven other captains beheaded at Hereford, as a sacrifice to the manes of those who had been executed after the battle of Wakefield*.

While Edward was thus occupied in the west, the queen with her victorious army advanced on the road to London, and met with no opposition till she had reached the town of St. Albans. It was held by the earl of Warwick, who had drawn up his troops on the low hills to the south. The royalists penetrated as far Feb. as the market cross, but were repulsed by a strong body 17. of archers. They next forced their way by another street as far as Barnet heath, where, after a long conflict, they put to flight the men of Kent. Night saved the Yorkists from utter destruction. They separated and fled in different directions, leaving the king in his tent under the care of the lord Montague, his chamberlain. He was soon visited by Margaret and his son, and embraced them with transports of joy. There fell in this battle about two thousand men. The next day Feb. the lord Bonville and sir Thomas Kyriel were beheaded 18. in retaliation for the executions at Hereford†.

- Thus by another unexpected revolution Henry was restored to his friends, and placed at the head of a victorious army. Could he have conducted that army immediately to the capital, the citizens must have opened the gates: but his soldiers were principally borderers, accustomed to live by rapine, and had been allured to the royal standard by the promise of plunder. No entreaty could prevail on them to march forward; no prohibition prevent them from dispersing to pillage the country; and the necessity of protecting their property attached to the banners of the house of York the citizens of London and the inhabitants of the neighbouring counties. Henry announced by proclamation that his assent to the late award had been extorted by violence, and issued orders for the immediate arrest of Edward, late earl of March, and son to the late duke of York *.
- Feb. 22. But Edward had now united his forces with those of the earl of Warwick; and their superiority of numbers induced the royalists to retire with expedition into the northern counties. They were not pursued. Edward had a more important object in view, and entered London with all the pomp of a victorious monarch. His youth (he was in his nineteenth year), his beauty and accomplishments, the unfortunate fate of his father and brother, the fame of his late success, and the ravages of the royalists, conspired to multiply the number of his adherents. To sound the disposition of the citizens, the lord Falconberg reviewed four thousand men in the fields, and Neville, bishop of Exeter, seized the opportunity to harangue the spectators on the unfounded claim, and the incapacity of Henry, the just title and the abilities of Edward. The acclamations which followed his speech were considered as a proof of the public feeling; and the next day it was resolved, in a great council, that Henry, by joining the queen's forces, had ^{Mar.} violated the award, and forfeited the crown to Edward, ^{3.} the heir of Richard late duke of York. As soon as this resolution was announced the prince rode in procession to Westminster-hall, and mounting the throne, explained ^{Mar.} to the audience the rights of his family. He then entered the church, repeated his speech, and on both occasions was frequently interrupted with cries of "Long live king Edward." He was immediately proclaimed in the usual style by the heralds in different parts of the city *.

On that day expired the reign of Henry VI., a prince, whose personal character commanded the respect of his very enemies, and whose misfortunes still claim the sympathy of the reader. He was virtuous, and religious; humane, forgiving, and benevolent; but nature had refused him that health of body and fortitude of mind which could have enabled him to struggle through the peculiar difficulties of his situation. It would be unjust to ascribe those difficulties to his misconduct: they arose from causes over which he had no control, the original defect in his title, the duration of his minority, the dissensions of his uncles, and the frequent recurrence of corporal debility, generally accompanied with the privation of reason. Some of these causes, however, gave birth to proceedings most interesting to those who wish to investigate the principles of our ancient constitution. From them it appears that, though the king, in the case of temporary absence from the realm, might appoint a regent with delegated authority during his absence, yet he could not, without the concurrence of the three estates, provide for the government during the minority of his successor—that whenever the reigning monarch, either through extreme youth or mental disease, was incapable of performing the functions of royalty, the exercise of his authority devolved exclusively on the house of lords, who appointed the great officers of state and the members of the council, giving to them powers to transact the ordinary business of government, but resuming those powers, as often as they themselves were assembled either in parliament or in a great council; and that the recognition of these doctrines was required from the first princes of the blood, the dukes of Bedford, Gloucester, and York, who at different times acknowledged that, during the king's minority or incapacity, they were entitled to no more authority than any other peer, unless it were conferred upon them by the whole body*. For the same reason, when the succession to the crown was disputed, the claims of each party were brought before the house of lords, as the only legitimate tribunal, which possessed the authority to pronounce on so important a question. The commons neither presumed, nor would have been suffered to interfere. They might indeed represent the urgency of the case to the upper house, might ask to be made acquainted with its resolutions, and, if an act of parliament were necessary, might give their assent; but the nomination of the protector and the counsellors was made, and their powers were determined by the peers alone; and the functions of the two houses were accurately distinguished in the language of the statutes, which attribute the appointment to the king by the advice and assent of the lords, and with the assent only of the commons†.

The commons, however, during this reign were careful to maintain that importance in the state which they had inherited from their predecessors. They continued to vote and appropriate the supplies; their concurrence was deemed necessary in the enactment of statutes; and they exercised the right of impeaching those ministers who had forfeited the confidence of the nation. If they suffered their claims of liberty of speech and freedom from arrest to be invaded by the imprisonment of Thorpe through the influence of the duke of York, and of Young by the order of the king, it should be remembered that these illegal acts were committed when the minds of men were heated by a contest for the crown, and therefore could form no precedents for more peaceable times. From Henry the commons obtained what had been refused or eluded by former sovereigns, a law for the personal security of all members of parliament while they attended their duty*; and several statutes were enacted to regulate the manner of elections, to prevent false returns, and to fix the qualifications both of the candidates and the voters. The sheriff was ordered to proceed to the election in the first county court after the receipt of the king's writ, between the hours of nine and eleven in the morning; to admit no longer the votes of all who attended, but to examine them upon oath, and to exclude those who did not both reside in the county, and possess within it a free tenement of the yearly value of forty shillings after the reduction of all charges; to return no candidate who was not a knight, "or notable esquire, or gentleman of birth, able to be a knight;" and to write the names of the persons returned in an indenture under the seals of all the voters. It was also provided that the representatives of the cities and burghs should be inhabitants of the same cities and burghs; that when the mayors or bailiffs made the return to the sheriff, he should give them his receipt; and that for every false return he should be liable to imprisonment, to a fine to the king, and to payment of damages to the injured candidate†.

The hereditary revenue of the crown had during several reigns been continually on the decrease: under

Henry it was more rapidly diminished by the enormous expenses incurred during the war in France, and by the numerous grants which were easily obtained from the benevolence of his disposition. In 1429 it was ascertained that the monies annually absorbed by the war exceeded the whole amount of the revenue by twenty thousand marks*, and four years later the receipts fell short of the expenses of government by the yearly sum of thirty-five thousand pounds: to which were to be added the outstanding debts of the crown, amounting to more than one hundred and forty-four thousand†. The only mode of relief which occurred to the financiers of the age was a general resumption of the grants made by the king since his accession; but, though such resumptions were repeatedly enacted, they were always rendered nugatory by the introduction of exceptions, at the demand of the king, or of the members, who sought to screen their friends from the operation of the act‡. In the mean while the ordinary revenue of the crown dwindled to the paltry sum of five thousand pounds; and it became necessary to make parliamentary provision for the support of the royal household. This was effected on some occasions by authorizing the treasurer to devote to that purpose a certain sum out of the monies voted for different objects; at others by appropriating a certain portion of the revenue to the royal

* Rym. x. 413. The receipts in the eleventh year of Henry amounted to about thirty-five thousand pounds; but this sum was reduced to less than one-fourth by fees, wages, and annuities, which had been granted by the crown to different individuals, and had been made payable out of these funds, before they were transferred to the royal treasury. But to the ordinary must be added the extraordinary revenue, which consisted of the customs on wool, and skins, and the tonnage and poundage, which, though not always, yet generally were granted by parliament. This, after the usual deductions had been made, amounted on an average of three years to about twenty-seven thousand pounds. THOUGH Edward had assumed the title of king, he was not ignorant that he held it by a very precarious tenure. The losses and advantages of the two parties were still nearly balanced; and if he was acknowledged by the southern, his rival could depend on the support of the northern counties. The earl of Warwick, anxious to bring the question to an issue, marched from London at the head of a body of veterans; Edward in a few days followed with the main army; and by the time of his arrival at Pontefract, forty-nine thousand men had arrayed themselves under his banner. The preparations of the house of Lancaster were equally formidable. The duke of Somerset with sixty thousand infantry and cavalry lay in the neighbourhood of York; and the queen, who with her husband and son had consented to remain within the city, employed all her address to confirm their loyalty, and animate their courage. Both armies advanced towards Ferrybridge. The passage had been gained by the lord Fitzwalter on the part of Edward *: but that nobleman was surprised and slain by lord Clifford, who within a few hours met on the same spot with a similar fate from the lord Falconberg. The next day between the villages of Towton and Saxton was fought the battle which fixed the crown on the brow of Edward. The engagement began at nine in the morning amidst a heavy fall of snow: the obstinacy of the combatants protracted it till three in the afternoon. At that hour the Lancastrians began to give way, at first leisurely and in good order; but finding their retreat interrupted by the river Cock, they abandoned themselves to despair, and while some plunged into the torrent, others offered themselves without resistance to the swords of the enemy. Edward had forbidden his followers to give quarter, and, as the pursuit and slaughter continued all the night and great part of the following day, one half of the Lancastrians are said to have perished. The earl of Northumberland and six barons fell in the battle: the earls of Devon and Wiltshire were taken in their flight and beheaded. The dukes of Somerset and Exeter had the good fortune to reach York, and conducted Henry and his family to the borders. The victory was decisive; but it cost the nation a deluge of blood. Besides those who perished in the waters, a

Beau sire Dieu, ores n'ay je recours au monde sinon à toy, qui es mon Createur, et mon Dieu: si te requiers vengeance. Et lors, en tirant son espée, baisa la croix, et dit à ses gens, "qui veult retourner, si s'en voise: car je vivray ou mourray aujourd'huy avec ceux qui demeureront avec-moy." contemporary writer assures us that thirty-eight thousand men remained on the field *: nor can we reasonably accuse him of exaggeration, since Edward himself, in a confidential letter to his mother, while he conceals his own loss, informs her that the heralds, employed to number the dead bodies, returned the Lancastrians alone at twenty-eight thousand †.

- From this scene of carnage the conqueror rode towards York, which he entered the next morning. The escape of Henry disappointed his hopes: but during his stay in the city he gave orders that several of his prisoners should be executed, and their heads substituted on the walls for those of his father and brother. From York he proceeded to Newcastle, receiving in his progress the homage of the inhabitants, and watching the motions of the fugitives. Henry, to purchase the aid of the Scots, had delivered to them the town of Berwick, and, while they with a powerful army undertook the reduction of Carlisle, penetrated with a few faithful friends into the county of Durham. He narrowly escaped being taken by the superior number of his enemies; and Carlisle was relieved by the lord Montague, who slew six thousand of the besiegers. Edward, who had already left the theatre of war, and hastened to London, was crowned at Westminster with the usual solemnity, and created his two younger brothers, George and Richard, who had returned from their asylum in Flanders, dukes of Clarence and Gloucester ‡.
- Nov. 4. When the parliament assembled, both houses were eager to display their attachment to their new sovereign. They first pronounced the reigns of the three last kings a tyrannical usurpation, and declared that Edward had been rightfully seized of the crown and the profits of the realm, from the fourth day of March last, in the same manner as they had been enjoyed by Richard II on the feast of St. Matthew in the twenty-third year of this reign. With certain exceptions the grants of Henry IV., V., and VI., were revoked, but their judicial acts were ratified, and the titles of honour which they had conferred were allowed*. Next followed a long and sweeping bill of attainder, which extended to almost every man who had distinguished himself in the cause of the house of Lancaster. Henry VI., his queen, their son Edward, the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earls of Northumberland, Devon, Wiltshire, and Pembroke, the viscount Beaumont, the lords Roos, Neville, Rougemonte, Dacre, and Hungerford, with one hundred and thirty-eight knights, priests, and esquires, were adjudged to suffer all the penalties of treason, the loss of their honours, the forfeiture of their estates, and an ignominious death, if they had not already fallen in the field of battle*. In defence of such unexampled severity was alleged the advantage of annihilating at once the power of the party; and to this motive was probably added another, the necessity of providing funds, from which Edward might satisfy the demands and expectations of those to whose services he owed the present possession of the crown. Before he dissolved the parliament he addressed the commons in the following terms: "James Strangways" (he was the speaker), Dec.

The cause of the red rose now appeared desperate;
 but it was still supported by the courage and industry of Margaret. The surrender of Berwick had given her a claim to the protection of the Scottish government; and the promise of an English dukedom, with lands to the yearly value of two thousand marks, had secured to her the services of the powerful earl of Angus; while Edward, as a counterpoise, purchased with an annual pension the fealty of the earl of Ross, lord of the isles, and sought to amuse Mary the queen dowager of Scotland† with a deceitful offer of marriage‡. To aid her cause Margaret resolved to visit the continent, and invite all true knights to avenge the wrongs of an injured mo-

twenty thousand crowns, and permitted Brezé, the senechal of Normandy, to follow her fortunes with two thousand men. After an absence of five months she Oct. returned, eluded the pursuit of the English fleet, and summoned to her standard her Scottish allies on the borders, and the friends of her family in Northumberland. Her hopes were cheered with a temporary gleam of success. Three strong fortresses, Bamborough, Alnwick, and Dunstanburgh, fell into her hands*. But Nov. when the earl of Warwick arrived with twenty thousand 3. men, and intelligence was received of the advance of Edward with an equal number, the Lancastrians separated to garrison their conquests, and the queen with her French auxiliaries repaired to their ships. The winds and the waves now seemed to have conspired against her: part of her fleet with all her treasures was dashed against the rocks; five hundred foreigners, who intrenched themselves in Holy Island, were killed or made prisoners by the lord Ogle; and Margaret and Brezé in a fishing boat carried the melancholy intelligence to their friends in Berwick. Edward proceeded Dec. no further than Newcastle. He laboured under diseases 9. caused by immoderate indulgence. But Warwick, dividing the royal army into three bodies, besieged at the same time the three fortresses, which made a brave and obstinate resistance†. At length Bamborough and Dec. Dunstanburgh were surrendered on condition that the 24. duke of Somerset, sir Ralph Percy, and some others, should take an oath of fealty to Edward and recover their estates and honours, and that the earl of Pembroke, the lord Roos, and the rest of the two garrisons should A. D. be conducted in safety to Scotland‡. Alnwick still 1463. bade defiance to the besiegers; and an army of Lan- Jan. castrians advanced apparently to its relief. Warwick 5.

drew up his forces to receive them; but the lord Hungerford, the son of Beaufort, and a few knights, having cut their way to their friends in a sally from the walls, Margaret's army retired, and the garrison, deserted by its leaders, capitulated. Edward was satisfied with the conduct of Somerset and Percy on this occasion. He repealed their attainders with the consent of parliament, restored to them their lands, granted a pension to Somerset, and re-established Percy in the possession of Bamborough and Dunstanburgh. But Alnwick was given to sir John Ashley, to the great offence of sir Ralph Grey, a partisan of the Yorkists, who had formerly won it for Edward, and now expected to possess it again*.

The spirit and activity of Margaret exposed her during this winter campaign to numerous privations and dangers. On one occasion it is said that, as she was riding secretly with her son and the seneschal through a wild and mountainous district, they were surprised by a party of banditti, who despoiled them of their money, jewels, and every other article of value. It is probable that the queen concealed her quality, or such distinguished captives would have been more carefully guarded. The ruffians quarrelled about the partition of the booty: menaces were uttered, and swords drawn, when Margaret, watching her opportunity, grasped her son by the arm, and plunged into the thickest part of the wood. She had not proceeded far when another robber made his appearance. The queen, with the intrepidity of despair, advanced to meet him; and taking the young Edward by the hand, "Friend," said she, "I intrust to your loyalty the son of your king." This address awakened his generosity. He took them both under his protection, and conducted them to the quarters of the Lancastrians†. Henry for security had been conveyed to the castle of Hardlough in Merionethshire, commanded by David ap Jevan ap Eynion, who in defiance of repeated acts of attainder refused to submit to Edward*: the queen, accompanied by the duke of Exeter, Brezé, and two hundred exiles, sailed to Sluys, ^{Apr.} in Flanders, and was received with real kindness by the count of Charolois, and with outward distinction by his father the duke of Burgundy. To her solicitations in favour of her husband that prince refused to listen: but he gave her a supply of money for her present expenses, and forwarded her in safety as far as the duchy of Bar in Lorrain, belonging to her father. There she fixed her residence, watching with anxiety the course of events, and consoling her sorrows with the hope of yet placing her husband or her son on the English throne†.

The Lancastrians, though by the conclusion of an armistice with France and another with Burgundy Edward had cut off the hope of foreign assistance‡, resolved to try again the fortune of war. Henry was summoned to put himself at the head of a body of exiles and Scots; Somerset, notwithstanding his submission, hastened from his own country, through Wales and Lancashire, to join his former friends; Percy assembled all the adherents of his family; and the resentment of Grey prompted him to surprise the castle of Alnwick, and to hold it against Edward. But their designs were disconcerted by the promptitude of Neville lord Montague, the warden of the east marches. He defeated and killed ^{A.  25, 28. of their followers were successively executed in that town and June 25. at York*. Of those who escaped, the major part followed Grey to the castle of Bamborough, which was immediately besieged by the earl of Warwick. Bamborough had been deemed an impregnable fortress; but Warwick had brought with him two of the king's largest iron cannon, called the Newcastle and London, with which he demolished its defences: and a brass piece called Dysson, which "smote through" sir Rauf Grey's chamber oftentimes." The havoc caused by the ordnance alarmed the garrison; it chanced that a large portion of a wall fell, and Grey with it; an offer to surrender was made; and it was agreed that the men should be at the king's "mercy," their commander at the king's "will." They had thought him dead, or dying; but he was carefully nursed by the cruelty of his victors, recovered, and was presented to the king at Dencaster. There the following judgment was pronounced upon him by Tiptoff, earl of Worcester, and constable of England: "Sir Ralph Grey,
 "for thy treason the king had ordained that thou shouldst
 "have thy spurs stricken off by the hard heels, by the hand "of the master cook, who is here present. Moreover, he "had ordained here, as thou mayest see, the kings of arms

 "reverse, the which thou shouldst wear on thy body,
 "going to thy death-wards, for that belongeth to thee after
 "the law. Notwithstanding, the degrading thee of knight-
 "hood, and of thine arms, and thy noblesse, the king

"and thou shalt have thy head smitten off, thy body to be buried in the Friars, and thy head where the king's pleasure shall be." This sentence was immediately executed*.

Henry, who had fled from Hexham before the arrival of Montague, was so closely pursued that three of his henchmen were taken clothed in gowns of blue velvet, and on them was found his bycoket, or cap of state, embroidered with two crowns of gold, and ornamented with pearls. He had, however, the good fortune to escape, and sought an asylum among the natives of Lancashire and Westmoreland, a people sincerely devoted to his interests†. Their fidelity enabled him for more than a year to elude the vigilance and researches of the government: but he was at last betrayed by the perfidy of Cantlow, a monk of Abingdon, and taken by the servants of sir James Harrington, as he sat at dinner in Waddington hall in Yorkshire. At Islington the unfortunate king was met by the earl of Warwick, who ordered by proclamation that no one should show him any respect, tied his feet to the stirrups as a prisoner, led him thrice round the pillory, and conducted him to the Tower. There he was placed in the custody of two esquires and two yeomen of the crown, but was treated with humanity, and allowed to enjoy the company of persons who did not excite suspicion‡.

After the flight from Hexham the Lancastrians abandoned the contest: and the conqueror had leisure to reward his partisans, and attend to the confirmation of his throne. Lord Montague was created earl of Northumberland, and lord Herbert earl of Pembroke; another long list of attainders contributed to exhaust the resources of his opponents and to add to those of his own partisans; and an act of resumption was passed to enable the king to live on the income of the crown, but clogged, as usual with so many exceptions, as to render it useless*. From internal polity he turned his thoughts to his relations with foreign states. To the pope he had already notified his accession, and sent an abstract of the arguments on which he founded his claim. The answer of Pius II. was civil, but guarded; and, while the pontiff congratulated the king on his elevation to the regal dignity, he cautiously abstained from any expression which might be deemed an approbation of his title†. With Scotland, which had so long offered an asylum to his enemies, Edward concluded a peace for fifteen, and afterwards prolonged it for fifty-five years. What measures the policy of Louis of France might have pursued, is uncertain: but that monarch was so harassed by the war of "the public good," as it was called, that he had no leisure or temptation to intermeddle with the concerns of foreign states; and the two most powerful of the French

Rot. Parl. v. 504. "Ever since the year 1389," says Stow, "the pikes of shoes and boots were of such length that they were fain to be tied up to their knees with chains of silver, or at the least with silk laces." Stow, 429. Such interference with private expenditure was very common, and at the same time very useless. It would appear, however, that he was afterwards liberated; for Edward appointed him his procurator in the court of Rome, granted to him an annuity of 100*l*, gave him permission to distribute the royal livery to twelve of his friends, and authorised him and his two brothers to bear on the upper part of their coat of arms the white rose, the device of the house of York. princes, the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, had entered into alliances defensive and offensive with the new king of England. Treaties almost similar were signed between him and the kings of Denmark and Poland in the north and east, and those of Castile and Arragon in the south, so that he might consider himself on terms of amity with almost all the great powers of Europe*.

In these circumstances the king no longer hesitated to acknowledge in public a marriage which he had some time before contracted in private. Ever since the battle of Towton he had resigned the management of affairs to the wisdom and activity of the Nevilles, and had devoted his own attention to the pursuit of pleasure. They had frequently urged him to marry into some royal or princely family, which might contribute to support him against his competitor; but the king felt no inclination to shackle himself with the chains of matrimony; and foreign princes were not anxious to offer their daughters to one whose claim to the crown was disputed, and whose possession of it was still precarious. It chanced that Edward visited Jacquetta the duchess of Bedford, and her husband Wydevile, lord Rivers, at Grafton, where he saw their daughter Elizabeth, a woman of superior beauty and accomplishments, and the relict of sir John Grey, a Lancastrian, who had fallen at the second battle of St. Albans. The lady Grey seized the opportunity to throw herself at the feet of her sovereign, and solicited him to reverse the attainder of her late husband in favour of her destitute children. The king pitied the suppliant; and that pity soon grew into love. To marry a woman so far beneath him, without the advice of his council, and at a moment when his throne tottered under him, was a dangerous experiment. But the virtue of Elizabeth was proof against the arts of the royal lover, and his passion scorned the cooler calculations of prudence. About the end of April, 1464, 30.

when the friends of Henry were assembling their forces in Northumberland, he repaired to Stony Stratford, whence early on the morning of the first of May he stole in great secrecy to Grafton. The marriage ceremony was performed by a priest in the presence of his clerk, of the duchess of Bedford, and of two female attendants. After an hour or two Edward returned to Stony Stratford, and pretending lassitude from hunting, shut himself up in his chamber. Two days afterwards he invited himself to Grafton. To divert the attention of the courtiers, their time was wholly occupied with the pleasures of the chase; nor did the king and Elizabeth ever meet in private till the duchess had ascertained that the whole family had retired to rest. Thus he spent four days; and then returning to London, issued orders for his army to join him in Yorkshire. But before his arrival in the north the war had been ended by the two victories of Hedgley Moor and Hexham; and after his return it became the principal subject of his solicitude to open the matter to his counsellors, and to obtain their approbation*.

For this purpose he summoned at Michaelmas a general council of the peers to meet in the abbey of Reading; and the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick, though they are supposed to have disapproved of the marriage, taking Elizabeth by the hand, introduced her to the rest of the lords, by whom, in the presence of the king, she was acknowledged and complimented as queen. Dec. Soon afterwards a second council was held at Westminster, and an income was settled on her of four thousand marks a year*. But, notwithstanding this outward show of approbation, there were many who murmured in private, and could ill disguise their jealousy at the elevation to the throne of a woman, whose father a few years ago was no more than a simple knight. To excuse the king, his friends circulated reports, that his inexperience had been deceived by the arts of the duchess and her daughter; that philtres and magic had been employed to extort his consent; and that he had since repented of his precipitancy, and struggled but in vain to dissolve the marriage†. But Edward himself, that he might silence those who objected the meanness of her birth, invited her maternal uncle, James of Luxembourg, who with a retinue of one hundred knights and gentlemen attended her coronation‡. On the feast A. D. of the Ascension the king created thirty-eight knights 1465. of the bath, of whom four were prudently selected from May the citizens of London. On the Saturday, to gratify the curiosity of the populace, she rode in a horse litter through the principal streets, preceded by the newly created knights. Her coronation followed on the Sunday, and the rest of the May week was devoted to feasting, tournaments, and public 26. rejoicings §.

* By all our ancient historians, with the exception of the unknown author of the Fragment published by Hearne at the end of Sprot, the marriage of Edward has been fixed on the 1st of May, 1464. That writer dates it in the preceding year (p. 293); and it has been urged in favour of the earlier date, that Edward in 1464 was too much occupied with the war to think of marriage, and that the anonymous writer expressly refutes from his own knowledge those who place it later. Carte, ii. 770. But it may be observed that, according to the dates in Rymer, the king did not summon his army till the ninth day after that on which the marriage is said to have taken place, and that the anonymous writer refutes, not those who place the marriage in a different year, but those who say the king was to have married the dowager queen of Scotland, p. 293, 294. Indeed he is at variance with himself. For though he places the marriage in 1463, he says it was in the same year as the battle of Hexham (292) which certainly took place in 1464. For the particulars of the marriage see that writer, and Fabian, p. 494, 495.

The elevation of Elizabeth was the elevation of her family. By the influence of the king her five sisters were married to the young duke of Buckingham, and to the heir of the earl of Essex, the earl of Arundel, the earl of Kent, and the lord Herbert; her brother Anthony to the daughter of the late lord Scales, with whom he obtained the estate and title; her younger brother John in his twentieth year to Catherine, the dowager but opulent duchess of Norfolk, in her eightieth*; and her son Thomas, by her former husband to Anne, the king's niece, and daughter and heiress to the duke of Exeter. We are assured by a contemporary that these marriages were viewed with jealousy by most of the nobility. Many saw those projects disconcerted which they had formed for the advancement of their own children, particularly the earl of Warwick, who had previously solicited the hand of the heiress of Exeter for his own nephew: all considered the sudden rise of the new family as an injury offered to themselves. To add to their discontent, the lord Mountjoy, treasurer of England, was removed to make place for the queen's father, who was created earl Rivers, and soon afterwards, at the resignation of the earl of Worcester, lord high constable †.

Of the three Nevilles, sons of the earl of Salisbury, George the youngest brother, bishop of Exeter, had received the seals on Edward's accession, and had lately been translated to the archiepiscopal see of York ‡. The next, the lord Montague, was warden of the east marches of Scotland, and with the title of earl of Northumberland had obtained the estates of the Percies. they had governed the king and the kingdom: now they foresaw the diminution of their influence by the ascendancy of a rival family. Edward had grown weary of the state of tutelage in which they detained him; the Wydeviles urged him to emancipate himself from the control of his own servants; and his affections were insensibly transferred from the men, who had given him the title, to those who exhorted him to exercise the authority of king. This coldness was first made public in the year 1467. A marriage had some time before been suggested between Margaret the king's sister and Charles count of Charolois, son to the duke of Burgundy, who, as he was sprung from the house of Lancaster, had always favoured the friends of Henry, but now, from motives of policy, sought an alliance with Edward to protect himself against his adversary the king of France. Warwick, who at the Burgundian court had become the determined enemy of Charles , and condemning the project, advised a marriage with one of the French princes. To his objections were opposed the advantages which would result from the intended alliance, to the king by converting the enemy of his family into a friend, and to the nation by affording greater facility to the commercial intercourse between England and the Netherlands. Edward, however, perhaps to free himself from an imperious counsellor, commissioned Warwick to treat with the king of France, who received him at Rouen with all the respect due to a sovereign prince; gave him for his residence the house next to his own, and by a private door repeatedly visited him in secret for the space of twelve days †. account of a real or affected sickness: but Edward, whose suspicions had been awakened by the conferences between Warwick and the French king, went to the house of the prelate with a numerous retinue, required him to deliver up the seals, and, in virtue of an act of resumption passed at the time, took from him two manors, which he had formerly obtained from the crown. About the same time the bastard of Burgundy arrived, avowedly to perform feats of arms with the lord Scales, by whom he had been challenged, though public suspicion assigned to him a secret and more important object, the negotiation of the intended marriage. The tournament took place †: but a few days later the duke of Burgundy died, and the bastard immediately departed with his retinue. Warwick then returned, bringing with him ambassadors from France, whose object it was to prevent the alliance between Edward and Charles. They had been instructed to offer to the king an annual pension from Louis, and to consent that his pretensions to Normandy and Aquitaine should be referred to the decision of the pope, who should be bound to give judgment within four years. But Edward received them coldly, left the capital, and appointed an inferior agent to hear, or rather to reject, their proposals. The early increased attention sought to compensate for the neglect of the king: but he was not sparing of hints and menaces in the company of his friends, and on the departure of the ambassadors retired in discontent to his castle at Middleham in Yorkshire‡. During his absence the treaty was resumed with Charles, now duke of Burgundy; the princess gave her consent to the marriage in a great council of peers at Kingston; and soon afterwards an emissary from queen Margaret, who had been taken in Wales, informed the king that Warwick was considered in the French court a secret partisan of the house of Lancaster. As the earl refused to quit his castle, he was confronted with his accuser at Middleham; and though the charge was declared to be groundless, the king selected a body guard of two hundred archers, who were ordered to attend always on his person. Every thing seemed to threaten a rupture, when their common friends A. In the course of the year Warwick appeared again at court. When Edward conducted his sister to the June coast, on her way to Flanders, she rode behind the earl 18. through the streets of the metropolis†; and on the discovery of a conspiracy in favour of Henry, he sat among the judges on the trial of the accused. But these outward appearances of harmony and confidence did not deceive the people; they foresaw the storm which was gathering; and while they pitied the real or imaginary wrongs of their favourite, laid the blame on the ambition of the queen and her relatives.

I have been the more particular in these details, that the reader might observe the origin and progress of the jeal- A. D. ousies and dissensions which dissolved the friendship be- 1469. tween Warwick and Edward, and led to the flight of the latter and the restoration of Henry‡. But with respect to most of the events which follow, he must be content with a bare and very imperfect narrative ; for though they were extraordinary in their nature, and most important in their results, yet, in the confused and mutilated records of the time, it is impossible to discover the immediate causes by which they were produced, or the secret relations which connected them with each other.

1. George, the elder of the surviving brothers of Edward, had received with the title of duke of Clarence a proportionate income, and had been named to the lieutenancy of Ireland, which office, on account of his age, he was permitted to execute by his deputy, the earl of Worcester. This young prince, dissatisfied at the ascendancy of the Wydeviles, absented himself frequently from court, and preferred to the company of his brother that of the earl of Warwick. Another cause for this preference may, perhaps, be found in the attachment which he had formed for Isabella, the daughter of that nobleman. Clarence was yet the next male heir to the throne ; and Edward, aware of the ambition of Warwick, earnestly laboured to prevent the marriage of the parties. His efforts were ineffectual ; and the ceremony was performed without his consent, in the king's secret marriage with Elizabeth, Warwick was in France negotiating on the part of the king a marriage with Bona of Savoy, sister to the queen of France ; and having succeeded in his mission, brought back with him the count of Dampmartin as ambassador from Louis. This they say was the origin of the quarrel between Edward and Warwick ; but to me the whole story appears a fiction. 1. If we except Warkworth, it was unknown to our ancient writers. 2. Warwick was not at the time in France. On the 20th of April, ten days before the marriage, he was employed in negotiating a truce with the French envoys in London (Rym. xi. 521), and on the 26th of May, about three weeks after it, was appointed to treat of another truce with the king of Scots (Rym. xi. 424). 3. Nor could he bring Dampmartin with him to England ; for that nobleman was committed a prisoner to the Bastille in September, 1463, and remained there till May, 1465. Monstrel. iii. 97. 109. Three contemporary and well-informed writers, the two continuators of the History of Croyland, and Wyrcester, attribute his discontent to the marriages and honours granted to the Wydeviles, and the marriage of the princess Margaret with the duke of Burgundy : a fourth tells us, from the mouth of Edward himself, that the king's suspicion of Warwick's fidelity arose from the secret conferences of that nobleman with Louis at Rouen ; and a fifth that Edward had made an attempt in the earl's house to violate the chastity of his niece or daughter. the church of St. Nicholas at Calais, by the uncle of the bride, the archbishop of York.

2. It was a singular coincidence that at the very time when this prelate and his brother met at Calais to celebrate the marriage in defiance of the king an insurrection should burst forth in that part of the realm where they possessed the principal influence. Its ostensible cause was the determination of the farmers of Yorkshire to resist the demand of a thrave of corn from every plough-land, made by the warden of the hospital of St. Leonard's. The thrave had been paid since the time of king Athelstan; and at the beginning of the last reign, when it had been withheld by some, was confirmed to the hospital by act of parliament*: now, however, when the officers attempted to levy its value by distress, the peasants flew to arms, chose for their leader Robert Hilyard, commonly called Robin of Redesdale, and threatened to march to the south, and reform the abuses of government. The citizens of York were alarmed by the approach of fifteen thousand insurgents; but the earl of Northumberland, Warwick's brother, to prevent the destruction of the city, attacked and defeated them with considerable slaughter. Their leader was executed on the field of battle.

3. This circumstance seems to acquit one of the Nevilles from all share in the insurrection: yet his subsequent inactivity and the conduct of his two brothers prove, that, whatever were its original cause, they were willing at least to convert it to their own purposes. Northumberland could, if he had pleased, have instantly extinguished the flame: he carelessly looked on, till it grew into a general conflagration. The rebels, though repulsed, were neither dispersed nor pursued; and in the place of the leader whom they had lost, they found two others of more illustrious name, and more powerful connexions, the sons of the lords Fitzhugh and Latimer; the one the nephew, the other the cousin-german of Warwick. These young men, though nominally at the head of the army, in reality obeyed the commands of sir John Conyers, an old and experienced officer. The claim of the hospital was now forgotten. Their avowed object was to meet the earl of Warwick, that with his advice they might remove from the king's councils the Wydeviles, the authors of the taxes that impoverished, and of the calamities that oppressed, the nation. At the name of Warwick his tenants crowded from every quarter; and in a few days the insurgents were said to amount to sixty thousand men*.

On the first intelligence of the rising in Yorkshire Edward had summoned his retainers; and in the interval having visited the monasteries in Suffolk and Norfolk, fixed his head-quarters at the castle of Fotheringay. Here the advance of the insurgents, their increasing numbers, and their menaces of vengeance, intimidated him. The whole population had been thrown into a ferment by the circulation of "bills of articles," as they were called, under the double title of "complaints and petitions of the king's faithful commons and true subjects." It was complained that he had debased the coin, and raised money by new and grievous impositions, by forced loans, and by heavy fines, the consequence of vexatious prosecutions, which within the last year only had amounted to more than 200,000 marks. But did he not possess the "livelihood" of the English crown, of the principality of Wales, of the duchies of Lancaster, Cornwall and York, of the earldoms of Chester and March, and of the lordship of Ireland

* During this insurrection reports of witchcraft were circulated against Jacquetta, the king's mother-in-law. She afterwards exhibited the following complaint to Edward: "To the king, our sovereign lord, sheweth, and lamentably complaineth unto your highness your humble and true liege woman Jacquetta, duchess of Bedford . . . that when she at all time hath and yet doth truly believe on God according to the faith of holy church, as a true Christian woman ought to do, yet Thomas Wake, esq. . . hath caused her to be brought in a common noise and slander of witchcraft throughout a great part of your realm, surmising that she should have used witchcraft and sorcery, inasmuch as the said Wake caused to be brought to Warwick at your last being there, sovereign lord" (he was then in the custody of Clarence, Warwick, and the archbishop), "to divers of the lords being there present, an image of lead made like a man of arms containing the length of a man's finger, and broken in the middle, and made fast with a wire, saying that it was made by your said oratrice, to use with the said witchcraft and sorcery; where she, nor none for her or by her ever saw it, God knoweth." Of course her innocence was admitted by the king. Rot. Parl., vi. 232. I have mentioned this, that the reader may see on what frivolous grounds these accusations were brought, and how anxious the highest personages were to guard against them.

How came it, then, that he could be in need of money? It was because he was surrounded by "seducious persons," who abused his generosity, and, by impoverishing him, enriched themselves — the queen's father, her step-mother, her brother, the lord Audeley, sir John Fogg, treasurer of the household, and Herbert and Stafford, lately created earls of Pembroke and Devon. It was therefore the humble petition of his faithful commons that he would call around him the lords of his blood, and the nobles of the realm; and with their advice inflict on those seducious persons that punishment which they deserved*.

From Fotheringay Edward advanced to Newark; but, alarmed at the disaffection which he observed on his march, he despatched letters written with his own hand to his brother Clarence, the earl of Warwick, and the archbishop, requesting them to hasten to him at Nottingham with the same retinue which usually attended them in time of peace. In the note to Warwick he added these significant words: "and we do not believe that ye should be of any such disposition toward us, as the rumour here runneth, considering the trust and affection we bear you. And, cousin, ne think but ye shall be to us wel-come†." But these noblemen had no intention to abandon the cause for which they had fermented the insurrection in the north. On the contrary, they summoned all their friends in Kent and the neighbouring counties to meet them in arms on the Sunday following, at Canterbury, for the avowed purpose of proceeding in company to the king, and laying before him the petitions of the commons. To Edward there remained but one source of hope — the speedy arrival of the earls Pembroke and Devon. The former, who had lately reduced the strong castle of Hardlough, was hastening with eight or ten thousand Welshmen to the aid of his sovereign: the latter followed with equal rapidity, leading a numerous body of archers, whom he had collected among the retainers of his family. They entered Banbury together, but quarrelled in an evil hour about their quarters, and Pembroke, leaving Devon in possession, marched onward to Edgecoat. Lord Fitzhugh, with the insurgents, was already in the neighbourhood. He did not suffer the opportunity to escape him, but brought his whole force to bear upon the Welshmen, who, separated from their friends, and without archers, offered an easy victory to the multitude of their enemies. Two thousand are said to have perished on the field of battle; Pembroke and his brother were taken and put to death. This defeat extinguished the hopes of Edward. He could not find a man to draw the sword in his favour. The troops whom he had arrayed slipped away from their colors, and his favourite sought for safety in concealment. But the earl Rivers, the queen's father, was discovered, with his son lord John Wydevile, in the forest of Deane; and the earl of Devon was taken by the commons of Somersetshire, at Bridgewater. All these were beheaded, by the order, it was said, of Warwick, — more probably because their names occurred in the list of proscription appended to the petition of the king's true subjects*.

4. The king's brother and the two Nevilles having arrayed their partisans at Canterbury, proceeded in search of Edward, whom they found at Olney, plunged in the deepest distress by the defeat of Pembroke, the murder of the Wydeviles, and the desertion of his friends. At the first interview they approached him with all those expressions of respect which are due from the subject to the sovereign; and Edward, deceived by these appearances, freely acquainted them with his suspicions and displeasure. But his imprudence was soon checked by the discovery that he was in reality their captive; and he hastily accepted those excuses which it would have been dangerous to refuse. The few royalists who had remained with the king dispersed, with the permission of Warwick: at his command the insurgents returned to their homes laden with plunder; and Edward accompanied the two brothers to Warwick; whence, for greater security, he was removed to Middleham, in the custody of the archbishop †.

England exhibited at this moment the extraordinary spectacle of two rival kings, each confined in prison : Henry in the Tower, Edward in Yorkshire. In such circumstances Warwick may have hoped to place his son-in-law, Clarence, on the throne : but all his plans were defeated by the activity of the Lancastrians, who seized the opportunity to unfurl the standard of Henry in the marches of Scotland, under sir Humphrey Neville*. The conduct of the earl proved that the suspicions previously entertained of his acting in concert with the partisans of that monarch were groundless. He summoned all the lieges of Edward to oppose the rebels : but the summons was disregarded, and men refused to fight in defence of a prince of whose fate they were ignorant. He therefore found it necessary to exhibit the king in public at York, having first obtained from him a grant of the office of justiciary of south Wales, and of all the other dignities held by the late earl of Pembroke. From York he marched into the north, defeated the Lancastrians, and conducted their leader to Edward, by whom he was condemned to lose his head on a scaffold. By what arguments or promises the has been scornfully rejected. Hume says it is contradicted by records. Carte and Henry pronounce it incredible and romantic. But, if it were, they should have accounted for what in that case were more inconceivable, the mention which is made of it by almost every writer of the age, whether foreign or native ; even by Commynes (iii. 4), who says that he received the principal incidents of Edward's history from the mouth of Edward himself, and by the annalist of Croyland (551), who was high in the confidence of that monarch. Hume's arguments are, 1°. That the records in Rymer allow of no interval for the imprisonment of Edward in 1470 ; and, 2°. That it is not mentioned, as, if it had happened, it must have been, in the proclamation of Edward against Clarence and Warwick of the same year. But, in the first place, he has mistaken the date of the imprisonment, which was not in 1470, but in 1469 (ea ætate quæ continebat anno nono regis, qui erat annus domini 1469. Cont. Croyl. 551) ; and, in the second, the proclamation ought not to have named it ; because it confines itself to the enumeration of those offences only which had been committed after the pardon granted to them at Christmas 1469 (Rot. Parl. vi. 233). But there is a record, which places the existence of the imprisonment beyond a doubt, — the attainder of Clarence, in which the king enumerates it among his offences : “ as in jupartying the “ king's royall estate, persone and life in straitte ward, putting him there- “ by from all his libertie, afre procuryng grete commocions.” Rot. Parl. vi. 193. I may add, that in the records in Rymer for 1469 there is a sufficient interval of three months, from the 12th of May to the 17th of August, the very time assigned to the insurrection and imprisonment.

king procured his liberty we know not*. A private treaty was signed: he repaired to the capital, accompanied by several lords of the party; and his return was hailed Nov. by his own friends as little short of a miracle. A council
6. of peers was now summoned, in which, after many negotiations, Clarence and his father-in law condescended to justify their conduct. Edward with apparent cheerfulness accepted their apology, and a general pardon was issued in favour of all persons who had borne arms against the king, from the first rising in Yorkshire under Robin of Redesdale, to the time when they were dismissed by the earl of Warwick at Olney †.

5. Elizabeth had not yet borne her husband a son, and though the eldest daughter was but four years old, Edward in this assembly asked the advice of the lords, how he should dispose of the young princess in marriage. For his own part, he wished to give her to George, the son of the earl of Northumberland, and presumptive heir to all the three Nevilles. His choice was unanimously approved; and the young nobleman, that his rank might approach nearer to that of his intended bride, was created duke of Bedford. This extraordinary measure has been explained on two suppositions: either that the king, alarmed at the marriage between his brother and the daughter of Warwick, sought to raise up a new and opposite interest in the family, or that, as the price of his liberation, he had

* By fayre spache and promyse the kynge scaped oute of the Bisshoppes hands. Warkworth, p. 7.

* The account of Edward's escape, which is generally given is, that the archbishop allowed him to hunt, and that one day, while he was employed in that exercise, he was carried off by his friends (Hall, 203). That which I have given depends on the superior authority of the historian of Croyland, who, while he considers the king's liberation almost miraculous, yet asserts that it had the express consent of Warwick. Præter omnem spem pene miraculose non tam evasit, quam de expresso ipsius comitis consensu dimissus est, p. 551. Stow mentions Edward's promises, and that he remained at York till after the execution of sir Humphrey Neville, p. 421. In Penn there is a letter without date, which I believe refers to this period. It relates the king's return from York to London in company with the archbishop, who, however, was not permitted to enter the capital with him, but ordered to remain at the Moor, his seat in Hertfordshire. The earl of Oxford, a Lancastrian, was treated in the same manner.—“The king,” adds the writer, “hath himself good language of the lords of Clarence and Warwick, and of my lords of York and Oxford saying they be his best friends; but his household men have other language, so that what shall hastily fall, I cannot say.” Fenn, i. 294.

promised to give his daughter to this young nobleman, the son of a brother who had never offended him, and the nephew of the two brothers who kept him in confinement.

6. To those who were not in the confidence of the parties their reconciliation appeared sincere. For greater security, a pardon for all offences committed before the feast of Christmas was granted to Clarence and Warwick; and in consequence of the restoration of peace within the realm, proposals were made to invade France in concert with the A. D. king's brother-in-law, the duke of Burgundy. The French 1470 ambassadors, who came over probably to learn the state of the different parties, were so much deceived, that Louis XI., in consequence of their representations, published an order to all his subjects to meet in arms on the first of May, that they might be in readiness to repel the threatened invasion*. Yet under this outward appearance of harmony, distrust and resentment festered in their breasts; and a singular occurrence proved how little faith was to be given to the protestations uttered on either side. The archbishop had invited the king to meet Clarence and Warwick at an entertainment, which he designed to give at his seat at the Moor in Hertfordshire. As Edward was washing his hands before supper, John Ratcliffe, afterwards lord Fitz-walter, whispered in his ear that one hundred armed men were lying in wait to surprise and convey him to prison. Without inquiring into the grounds of the information, he stole to the door, mounted a horse, and rode with Feb. precipitation to Windsor. His abrupt departure revived all the former dissensions; fresh conferences were held at Baynard's castle, under the mediation of Cecily, duchess of York, the king's mother; and a new reconciliation was effected, equally insincere with those which had preceded it†.

7. During these conferences an insurrection burst out in Lincolnshire, of which the king could at first discover neither the real object nor the authors. The inhabitants, provoked by the extortions of the officers of the household,

- rose in arms, chased sir Robert Burgh, a purveyor, out of the county, burnt his mansion, and pillaged his estates.
- Mar. 7. This outrage, and the fear of punishment, bound them more strongly to each other, and emboldened sir Robert Welles, a partisan of Warwick and the real instigator of the rising, to place himself openly at their head. The king commissioned several persons, and among them the duke and earl, to levy troops for his service ; and before he left London sent for the lord Welles, father of sir Robert, and for sir Thomas Dymock, the champion, to appear before the council. They wavered, obeyed the summons, then fled to a sanctuary, and afterwards, on the promise of pardon, repaired to the court. Edward insisted that lord Welles should employ his paternal authority, and command his son to submit to the royal mercy : but the young man at the same time received letters from Warwick and Clarence, exhorting him to persevere, and assuring him of speedy and powerful aid. When the king had reached Stamford, and found that sir Robert was yet in arms, he ordered, in violation of his promise, the father and Dymock to be beheaded ; and sent a second summons to sir Robert, who indignantly replied that he would never trust the perfidy of the man who had murdered his parent. This answer was, however, dictated by resentment and despair. The king attacked the insurgents at Erpingham, in Rutlandshire : his artillery mowed down their ranks : their

19. paid the forfeit of their lives. Their confessions show that the insurrection had been got up at the instigation of Clarence and Warwick, that a confidential emissary from the duke regulated the movements of the force, and that the avowed object was to raise Clarence to the throne in the place of his brother Edward *. They had received orders to avoid an engagement, and to march into Leicestershire ;

* Rot. Parl. vi. 144. but chance or mismanagement brought them into collision with the royalists, and their total defeat placed the leaders, Clarence and Warwick, in a most perplexing situation. They had purposed to join sir Robert Welles on the morrow : now, seeing themselves unable to cope with the king, they advanced towards Yorkshire, having previously by proclamation ordered every man able to bear arms to join them, under the penalty of death *. The king was at Doncaster when they reached Esterfield, at the distance of twenty miles ; and having arrayed his forces, he sent Mar. Garter-king-at-arms to summon them to appear before him, 20. and clear themselves of the offences laid to their charge. They immediately turned to the west, and marched to Manchester, to solicit the aid of the lord Stanley, who had married the sister of Warwick. Want of provisions prevented the pursuit by the royal army, and Edward, hastening to York, published a proclamation, in which he enu- Mar. rated their offences, but exhorted them to return to their 23. duty within a certain term, assuring them that if they could vindicate their innocence, he would accept their justification with pleasure ; and that if they could not, he would still remember that they were allied to him by blood, and had been once numbered amongst his dearest friends †. At the same time he took from Clarence the lieutenancy of Ireland, and gave it to the earl of Worcester ; restored to Henry Percy the earldom of Northumberland and the wardenship of the east marches, giving in Mar. compensation to Warwick's brother, who had held them 25. ever since the battle of Towton, the barren title of marquess Montague ; and having learned that the fugitives, unable to corrupt the fidelity of the lord Stanley, had marched to the south, issued commissions to array the population of Mar. all the counties through which it was probable they would 26. pass. From York he hastened to Nottingham ; where, as the time allotted to them had expired, he declared them Mar. traitors, and, having offered rewards for their apprehension, 31. continued his march with the greatest expedition ‡. they fled more rapidly than he could pursue; and sailed from Dartmouth by the time that he reached Exeter. At April Southampton they made a bold attempt to cut out of the 15. roads a large vessel, the Trinity, belonging to the earl of Warwick, but were repulsed with considerable loss by the exertions of the lord Scales. Edward arrived in a short time, and by his orders the prisoners made in the late action, about twenty in number, were delivered to Tiptoff, earl of Worcester and earl constable, by whom they were condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered. But he was not satisfied with the death of his victims. The indignities inflicted on their remains for the space of three weeks excited the execration of the people, and earned for Tiptoff himself the nickname of the Butcher*.

Warwick had intrusted the government of Calais to a gentleman of Gascony, named Vaclerc, a knight of the garter. To his dismay and astonishment, the batteries of the place opened upon him as he attempted to enter. It was in vain that he sent an officer to remonstrate. Vaclerc, acquainted with the recent transactions in England, had resolved to play a deep, but, he trusted, a secure game. To Warwick he apologized for his conduct, by informing him that the garrison was disaffected, and would, if he landed, infallibly betray him. At the same time he despatched a messenger to Edward with assurances of his loyalty, and his determination to preserve so important a fortress for his sovereign. What impression his reasons made on the mind of Warwick we know not; but Edward rewarded Vaclerc with the government of Calais, and the duke of Burgundy granted him a pension of a thousand crowns. The fugitives, after some deliberation, steered their course towards Normandy, captured every Flemish merchantman which fell in their way, and were received at Harfleur, with distinguished honours, by the admiral of France†.

the house of Lancaster : but he now saw the advantage to be derived from the arrival of Warwick and his friends, and ordered them and their ladies to be provided with the best accommodations in the neighbouring towns. Clarence and the earl were invited to his court at Amboise and Angers, where they met Henry's queen, Margaret of Anjou. No July two persons had ever inflicted more serious injuries on each 16. other than the earl and that princess : but misfortune blunted the edge of their mutual hatred, and interest induced them to forget their past enmity. After a decent struggle Margaret suffered her antipathy to be subdued by Warwick's oaths and the authority of Louis. The earl acknowledged Henry for his rightful sovereign, and bound himself to aid her, to the best of his power, in her efforts to restore her husband to the throne. She promised on the gospels never to reproach him with the past, but to repute him a true and faithful subject for the future. To cement their friendship, it was agreed that the prince, her son, should marry his daughter Anne, and, to lull the probable discontent of Clarence, that, in failure of issue by such marriage, the right of the crown should, on the death of the prince, devolve on the duke ; and lastly, Louis, in consequence of this reconciliation, engaged to furnish the aid which Warwick required for his projected expedition to England*.

The only persons dissatisfied with this arrangement were Clarence and his consort. He had hitherto been induced to follow the counsels of Warwick by the prospect of succeeding to his brother on the throne : he now saw another claimant interposed between himself and the object of his ambition, and his chance of success made to depend on a distant and very uncertain contingency. His discontent was artfully fomented by the

* Com. ibid. Hall, 206, 207. Frag. 304. Lel. Coll. ii. 503. Ellis, i. 132. That this marriage actually took place, is clear both from the testimony of our own historians, and from the order given by Louis that the city of Paris should receive in public procession the queen of England avec son fils le prince de Galles et sa femme fille dudit comte de Warrick, avec la femme dudit de Warwick mere de la femme dudit prince de Galles. intrigues of a female agent. A lady in the suite of the duchess had in the hurry of the flight been left in England, but was permitted to follow, in appearance through the attention of the king to his sister-in-law,—in reality, that she might carry private instructions to Clarence. She represented to that prince how unnatural it was for him to fight against his brother, and to support the cause of a family, the prosperity of which must depend on the destruction of his own. These suggestions were not lost on a mind already predisposed to receive them; and the duke, it is said, found the means to assure Edward, that when the occasion should offer, he would prove himself a loyal subject and affectionate kinsman*.

The conduct of that prince during this interval is almost inexplicable. If we except the execution of some, and the banishment of others, among the adherents of Warwick, he took no precautions to avert, made no preparations to meet, the approaching storm. His time was spent in gallantries and amusements: the two brothers of Warwick were received into favour; and one of them, the marquess Montague, was honoured with the royal confidence†. In such circumstances, no man but the infatuated monarch himself entertained a doubt of the result, if Warwick should effect a landing. That nobleman had always been the favourite, his exile had made him the idol, of the people; no ballad was popular in the towns and villages which did not resound his praise; and every pageant and public exhibition made allusions to his virtues and his misfortunes. But if Edward was indolent, his brother-in-law, the duke of Burgundy, was active. He sent emissaries to Calais to watch the conduct of Vauclerc; complained to the parliament of Paris of the reception which had been given to his enemy; sought by menaces and preparations of war to intimidate Louis; seized all the French merchandize in his territories as an indemnity for the captures made by Warwick; and despatched a powerful squadron to blockade the mouth of the river Seine. But the Burgundian ships were dispersed by a storm; and the next morning the exiles, under the protection of a French fleet, left their anchorage, and steering across the channel, landed without opposition at Plymouth and Dartmouth*. The incautious Edward had been drawn as far as York by an artifice of the lord Fitzhugh, brother-in-law to Warwick, who pretended to raise a rebellion in Northumberland, and on the approach of the king, retired within the borders of Scotland†. Thus the southern counties were left open to the invaders. The men of Kent had risen in arms: in London Dr. Goddard preached at St. Paul's Cross in favour of the title of Henry VI.; Warwick proclaimed that monarch, ordered all men between sixteen and sixty to join his standard, and marched with an army, which increased every hour, in a direct line towards Nottingham. The thoughtless king had affected to treat the invasion with his usual levity: he was happy that his enemies had at last put themselves in his power, and trusted that the duke of Burgundy would prevent their escape by sea. But the delusion was soon dissipated. Very few of those whom he had summoned resorted to his quarters at Doncaster; and of these few many took the first opportunity to depart. As he sat at dinner, or lay in bed, word was brought that Warwick continued to approach with the utmost expedition; nor had he recovered from his surprise before a second messenger informed him that six thousand men, who had hitherto worn the white rose, ad, at the instigation of Montague, thrown away that device, and tossing their bonnets into the air, had cried, "God bless king Harry." A battalion of guards was immediately despatched to secure a neighbouring bridge, and the king, after a short consultation with his friends, mounting his horse, rode, without stopping, to the town of Lynn. He found in the harbour an English ship, and two Dutch brigs; and embarking in them with a few noblemen and about eight hundred followers, compelled the sailors to weigh anchor, and steer immediately for the coast of Holland. The fugitives were descried by a fleet of pirates from the Hanse Towns; and, to escape the pursuit of these unknown enemies, the king was compelled to run his vessel on shore. He landed near Alkmaar, was received with every token of respect by Grutuse the governor of the province, and conducted by him to the Hague to meet the duke of Burgundy. Thus, by his presumption and inactivity, did Edward lose his crown, before he could strike one blow to preserve it*.

Queen Elizabeth with her family had remained in the Tower: but perceiving that the tide of loyalty had turned in favour of Henry, she left that fortress secretly, and fled with her mother and three daughters to the sanctuary of Westminster, where she was shortly afterwards delivered of a son†. Within a few days Clarence and Warwick made their triumphal entry into the capital. Henry was immediately conducted from the Tower to the bishop's palace; and thence walked in solemn procession, with the crown on his head, to the cathedral of St. Paul's. His friends attributed his restoration to the undoubted interposition of Heaven‡; by foreign nations it was viewed with wonder, or treated with ridicule; to himself it is doubtful whether it proved a source of joy or regret. He had been the captive of Edward; he was now the slave of Warwick*.

By a parliament summoned in the name of the restored king, Edward was pronounced an usurper, his adherents were attainted, and all acts passed by his authority were repealed. The next step was to ratify the convention of Amboise. An act of settlement entailed the crown on the issue male of Henry VI., and in default of such issue, on the duke of Clarence and the heirs of his body; and appointed that prince, with his father-in-law, protectors of the realm, during the minority of Edward, the present prince of Wales. All the lords, who had suffered for their attachment to the cause of Henry, recovered their titles and property; Clarence was made heir to his late father Richard duke of York, promoted to the lieutenancy of Ireland, and in place of some manors, which had belonged to Lancastrians, received other grants of equal, perhaps of superior value; Warwick reassumed his offices of Chamberlain of England and captain of Calais, to which was added that of lord high admiral; his brother the archbishop was again intrusted with the seals; and his other brother the marquess recovered the wardenship of the marches†. But if the conquerors thus provided for themselves, it must be added in their praise that their triumph was not stained with blood. The only man who suffered was the earl of Worcester, whose cruelty in the office of constable has been already mentioned. "He was juged by such lawe as he "dyde to other menne;" but his remains were "buryede "with alle the honoure and worschyppe that his frendes "coude do‡."

To no one did this sudden revolution afford greater satisfaction than to Louis of France. By his orders it was celebrated with public thanksgivings and rejoicings for three days, and Margaret was received at Paris with the same distinction as a queen of France. To complete Henry, a splendid embassy proceeded to London, and a treaty of peace and commerce for fifteen years cemented the union between the two crowns*. The duke of Burgundy, on the contrary, found himself placed in a most distressing dilemma. Edward had fled to him and solicited his aid. Could he refuse the brother of his consort? The dukes of Exeter and Somerset had reached his court, and reminded him that he was descended from the same ancestor as Henry. Could he contribute to dethrone a prince of his own blood? By aiding Edward, he might provoke Henry to espouse the cause of Louis, who had already wrested from him a rich and populous territory: by refusing to aid him, he should expose himself to equal danger from the friendship between the two crowns. At last he adopted the crooked, but in this instance successful, policy, of rejecting in public, while he favoured in private, the cause of the exile. By proclamation he forbade under severe penalties any of his subjects to lend assistance to Edward: in secret he made him a present of fifty thousand florins, ordered four large ships to be equipped for his use at Vere in Holland, and hired fourteen vessels from the Hanse Towns to transport him to England†.

About the middle of Lent the hostile fleet was descried off the coast of Suffolk; but the preparations which had been made, and the activity of a brother to the earl of Oxford, deterred it from approaching the land. Continuing his course to the north, Edward entered the Humber, and with fifteen hundred men disembarked at Ravenspur, the very place where Henry IV. landed to dethrone Richard II. The hostility of the inhabitants induced him to imitate the dissimulation and perjury of that monarch. He exhibited a pretended safe-conduct from the earl of Northumberland; protested that he came not to claim the throne but the inheritance of his late father, the duke of York; wore in his bonnet an ostrich feather, the device of Edward, the Lancastrian prince of Wales; and ordered his followers to shout "Long live king Henry," in every village and town through which they passed. At the gates of York, and afterwards on the altar of the cathedral, he was compelled to abjure on oath, in presence of the corporation and clergy, all his pretensions to the crown*. Such a reception was not calculated to flatter his hopes: but he staked his life on the result; he resolved to press forward; and the boldness and decision which marked his conduct, contrasted with the inactivity, timidity, and irresolution of his adversaries, will justify a suspicion that he possessed resources, and was encouraged by promises, of which we are ignorant. At Pontefract lay the marquess Montague with an army sufficiently numerous to have overwhelmed the invaders. A short correspondence passed between Edward and that commander. The former passed within four miles of the head-quarters of his adversary, and not a sword was drawn to impede or retard his progress†. But the rivulet, as it rolled on, was swelled by the accession of numberless streams: at Nottingham the exile saw himself at the head of several thousand men; and in his proclamations he assumed the title of king, and summoned every loyal subject to hasten to the aid of his sovereign. Clarence also threw off the mask. He had raised a numerous body of men under a commission from Henry; he now ordered them to wear the white rose over their gorgets, and joined his brother near Coventry, where the earls of Warwick and Oxford had concentrated their forces. Both the battle and the reconciliation, which Edward offered, were obstinately refused; and the Yorkists directed their march with expedition to the capital, which had been intrusted to the care of the archbishop. That prelate already April 11. began to waver. In the morning he conducted Henry, decorated with the insignia of royalty, through the streets of the city; in the afternoon he ordered the recorder Urswick to admit Edward by a postern in the walls. In his excuse it was alleged, that the party of the house of York had gained the ascendancy among the citizens; that the richest of the merchants were the creditors of Edward; that his affability and gallantries had attached numbers to his interests; and that the sanctuaries contained two thousand of his adherents, ready at a signal to unsheath the sword in his favour. However that may be, the archbishop secured a pardon for himself, and ruined the cause of his brothers*. Warwick and Montague followed their adversary, expecting to find him encamped before the capital: but he, apprehensive of the Lancastrians within its April 13. walls, immediately left it, and taking Henry with him, advanced to meet his pursuers as far as Barnet. Clarence, who felt some compunction for the part which he had acted, sent to offer his services as mediator between his father-in-law and his brother. "Go and tell your master," replied the indignant earl, "that Warwick, true to his word, is a better man than the false and perjured Clarence." He had appealed to the sword; he would admit of no other arbiter between him and his enemies†.

little to the north of the town of Barnet. Warwick had already chosen his ground ; Edward made his preparations during the darkness of the night ; in consequence of which, he posted by mistake his right wing in front of the enemy's centre, while his left stretched far away to the west. But at day-break a fog of unusual density concealed from both parties their relative position : and at five o'clock the king gave by trumpet the signal for battle. It lasted four or five hours, but is described to us as a succession of partial actions taking place in different parts of the field, as individual leaders espied through the mist an opportunity of assailing an opponent. Friends were repeatedly taken for foes : and such rencontres excited on both sides suspicion of treason. The left wing of the Lancastrians, having no opponent in front, drew towards their centre ; and, accumulating in number, trampled down the extreme right of the Yorkists, and pursued the fugitives through Barnet on the road to the capital. From the same cause the Yorkists on the left gradually advanced and reinforced their centre, where Edward was contending with success against the utmost efforts of Warwick. On the earl's part, his brother Montague had already fallen ; the duke of Exeter, though wounded only, had been left among the dead ; and the earl of Oxford, whose badge of a star with rays, so like to Edward's badge, a sun with rays, had exposed him to the attack of his own friends, had withdrawn in distrust, with his corps of seven hundred men, from the field. On the other, the king had lost the lords Say and Cromwell, and the son of the lord Berners, with many of his bravest knights. At last the welcome intelligence was brought to him that the body of Warwick had been found lying near a thicket, breathless, and despoiled of armour. This terminated the battle of Barnet, in which, according to some writers, the slain amounted to many thousands, though by one who was wounded in it the number is reduced to ten or eleven hundred *. To Edward the death of Warwick was of greater importance than any victory. That nobleman by a long course of success had acquired the surname of the king-maker ; and the superstition of the vulgar believed that the cause which he supported must finally triumph. His body, April with that of his brother Montague, was exposed naked for 15. three days on the pavement of St. Paul's, and then deposited among the ashes of his fathers in the abbey of Bilsam. Edward entered the city in triumph, remanded the unfortunate Henry to his cell in the Tower, and resumed the exercise of the sovereign authority. But he was not long permitted to indulge in repose or festivity. He had fought at Barnet on April the Sunday : on the Friday he was again summoned into the 19. field. Queen Margaret, who had been detained for weeks on the French coast by the state of the weather, had at last embarked at Harfleur ; but her hopes were again disappointed by the violence of the wind, and three weeks elapsed before she landed with a body of French auxiliaries at Weymouth. It was the very day of the battle of Barnet. She was hardly recovered from the fatigue of the voyage when a messenger arrived with the fatal intelligence. All her hopes were instantly broken : she sank to the ground in despair ; and, as soon as she came to herself, hastened with her son for safety to the abbey of Cerne . But the Lancastrian lords who still remained faithful to the cause induced her to quit her asylum, conducted her to Bath, and raised a considerable body of troops to fight under her banner. If this army could have joined that under the earl of Pembroke in Wales, the crown might perhaps have been again replaced on the head of Henry. But the citizens of Gloucester had fortified the bridge May over the Severn ; and when she reached Tewksbury Edward 4. was already at hand with a more numerous force. The Lancastrians had entrenched themselves at Tewksbury in a strong position at the end of the town, covered on the back by the extensive walls of the abbey, and having in front and on the sides a country so deeply intersected with dikes, and hedges, and lanes, that " it was a ryght evill place to approach, as could well have been devysed." On the morrow, Edward commenced the attack with a heavy cannonade, which was returned with spirit. But it soon became evident that the king had the advantage in the number and weight of his guns, and the multitude of his archers, who poured showers of arrows within the entrenchments. Still the Lancastrians did not flinch; and after some time the duke of Somerset, with a chosen band, stole by a circuitous route to the top of an eminence, near the foot of which was stationed a corps commanded by the king in person. Suddenly they charged it in flank; but, fortunately for Edward, two hundred spearmen who had been detached to a neighboring wood, observing the movement, fell unexpectedly on the rear of the assailants, who were thrown into confusion and fled for their lives. It may be that this failure disheartened the Lancastrians. The defence grew fainter every minute. Soon the banner of the duke of Gloucester, next that of Edward himself, waved within the entrenchment; and Somerset, as we are told, suspecting the lord Wenlock of treachery, rode up to that nobleman and at one stroke beat out his brains. The victory was now won. Of the prisoners, the most important was the Lancastrian prince of Wales, who was taken to Edward in the field. To the question what had brought him to England, he boldly but ingenuously replied, "To pre-serve my father's crown and my own inheritance." The king, it is said, had the barbarity to strike the young prince in the face with his gauntlet: Clarence and Gloucester, perhaps the knights in their retinue, despatched him with their swords.

It is probable that many of the Lancastrian leaders might have escaped by flight, if they had not sought an asylum within the church. While they were triumphant, they had always respected the right of sanctuary; and a hope was cherished that gratitude for the preservation of his wife, his children, and two thousand of his partizans, would restrain Edward from violating a privilege to which he was so much indebted. But the murder of the young prince had whetted his appetite for blood. With his sword drawn he attempted to enter the church: but a priest in his sacerdotal garments,

* Cont. Croyl. 556. Holinshead, 1340. Stow, 424. Fabyan, 505. There may be exaggerations in the common account of the prince's death: but I see no good reason to dispute Stow's narrative: "he smote him on the face with his gauntlet, and after his servants slew him." (Stow, ibid.) It is not contradicted by the writers who say that the prince fell "in the war or in the field:" it is countenanced by those who say that he was taken, and afterwards slain: "such as abode handstrokes were slayne incontinent. Edward called prince was taken fleeing to the townward, and slayne in the fiede." Harl. MSS. 543. Historie, p. 38.

with the consecrated host in his hand, met him at the door, and adjured him, in the name of his Redeemer, to spare the lives of the fugitives. The promise was solemnly given; the king proceeded to the high altar, and a prayer of thanksgiving was offered up for the victory. This happened on the Saturday; on Monday the duke of Somerset, the lord prior of St. John's, six knights, and seven esquires, were dragged before the dukes of Gloucester and Norfolk, condemned, and beheaded. But were they not under the protection of the royal promise? So it is asserted by the Lancastrian writers. Edward's apologists pretend that though the abbey church had not the privilege of sanctuary for men guilty of treason, the promise was faithfully observed, as far as regarded those who sought an asylum within its walls. The prisoners executed were those only who had concealed themselves in the abbey itself, or in the town*.

- There now remained but one person whose life could give uneasiness to Edward. As long as the son lived to claim the crown of his father the blood of Henry was not worth the shedding: but now that the young prince was no more, to remove the old king, was to remove the last temptation from his adherents, whose attachment to their ancient sovereign appeared to grow with the decline of his fortunes. Only a week had elapsed after the battle of Tewksbury when the bastard of Falconberg, who had been vice-admiral to Warwick, and commanded a fleet of adventurers, made a bold attempt to liberate the royal prisoner from the Tower. Landing at Blackwall, and calling to his aid the commons of Essex and Kent, he advanced to attack the city, burnt Bishopsgate, and even won possession of Aldgate; but after a long and bloody contest was driven back to Stratford. Still he persevered; his followers were summoned to meet him again on Blackheath, and a second assault had been arranged, when the approach of Edward with his victorious army warned him to withdraw to his ships. It is probable that this bold though unsuccessful attempt sealed the doom of the unfortunate captive. On the afternoon of Tuesday the conqueror made his triumphal entry into the capital: on that of Wednesday the dead body of Henry was exposed in St. Paul's. To satisfy the credulous, it was reported, as had been formerly reported of Richard II., that he died of grief. But though Edward might silence the tongues, he could not control the thoughts or the pens of his subjects*; and the writers who lived under the next dynasty not only proclaim the murder, but attribute the black deed to the advice, if not the dagger, of the youngest of the royal brothers, Richard duke of Gloucester†. From St. Paul's the body of Henry was conveyed by water for interment at Chertsey, under a guard of soldiers, belonging to the garrison of Calais‡. By the friends of the house of Lancaster the deceased monarch was revered as a martyr. It was soon whispered that miracles had been wrought at his tomb, and Richard III., apprehensive of the impression which such reports might make on the

* There are two contemporary writers by whom the death of Henry is mentioned, the Croyland historian, and the narrator of the manner in which Edward recovered the crown (Harl. MSS. 543), both in the service of Edward, the one being a doctor of Canon law, and member of his council, the other a person who saw much of what he states, "and the residue knew by true relation of them that were present." Now the first employs language which not only shows his conviction that Henry was murdered, but seems to hint that it was ordered, if not perpetrated, by one of the brothers. "Parcat deus, et spatium penitentiae ei donet, quicumque tam sacrilegas manus in christum domini ausus est inmittere: unde et agens tyranni, patiensque gloriosi martyris titulum mereatur." Con. Croyl. 556. The other states merely, as was stated by Edward's friends, that Henry died of "pure displeasure and melancholy." It detracts, however, from his credit, that he appears in other instances to have suppressed or disguised facts which bore hard on the character of his patron, particularly Edward's perjury at York, and the murder of the prince after the battle of Tewksbury.

† Mr. Laing, in his dissertation at the end of Henry's history (xii. 393) undertakes to acquit Richard of the murder of Henry on the ground that he did not die at the time assigned, but much later. The proof is, that, as Maloué observes (Shakspeare, xi. 653), "it appears on the face of the public accounts allowed in the exchequer for the maintenance of Henry VI. and his numerous attendants in the Tower, that he lived till the twelfth of June, twenty-two days after the time assigned for his pretended assassination." These accounts are to be found in Rym. xi. 712. But they afford no proof that Henry lived till the 12th of June. The latest date of any particular charge is that of William Sayer for the maintenance of Henry and ten guards for a fortnight, beginning the 11th of May, and of course ending on the day on which the king is said to have been buried. The mistake arises from this, that Maloué has taken the day of the month on which the accounts were allowed at the exchequer, for the day on which the expenses ceased: which is so far from being the case that it even belongs to a different year, 1472 and not 1471: as appears from the two next accounts, which, though allowed on the 24th of June, refer to expenses in September and October of 1471. See them in Rym. xi. 713, 714.

public mind, removed his bones from Chertsey to Windsor. Henry VII. placed, or intended to place them among the tombs of his ancestors in Westminster abbey*.

Before I proceed with the reign of Edward, it may not be amiss to notice the history of the surviving adherents of Henry.—1. Margaret was confined first in the Tower, afterwards at Windsor, and lastly at Wallingford, with a weekly allowance of five marks for the support of herself and her servants. After a captivity of five years she was ransomed by Louis of France, and closed her eventful life in 1482 in her own country. 2. Henry Holand duke of Exeter, and great-grandson of John of Ghent by his second daughter Elizabeth, had been severely wounded in the battle of Barnet, but was conveyed by one of his servants from the field to the sanctuary at Westminster. It was expected that he would obtain his pardon through the influence of his wife Anne, the eldest sister of Edward. But that lady solicited and obtained a divorce in 1472, and married sir Thomas St. Leger. The duke was at the time in the custody of the king, with the weekly allowance of half a mark: the next year his dead body was found floating in the sea between Dover and Calais†. 3. Vere, earl of Oxford‡, had escaped into Scotland, and thence into France: but disdaining a life of indolence, he collected a small squadron of twelve sail, swept the narrow seas, kept the maritime counties in perpetual alarm, and by frequent captures enriched himself and his followers. With about four hundred men he surprised the strong fortress of Mount St. Michael in Cornwall, whence he made repeated inroads into the neighbouring counties, receiving supplies from the friends of the house of Lancaster, and wreaking his vengeance on those of the house of York. By Edward's command, sir Henry Bodrugan besieged the mount: but his fidelity was suspected; and he was superseded by Richard Fortescue, sheriff of Cornwall. The new commander had been a Lancastrian and a friend: he had recourse to promises and persuasion; and the earl, apprehensive of the treachery of his own men, surrendered the place on condition that his life and the lives of his followers should be spared, with the exception of the lord Beaumont and sir Richard Lanmarth. During eleven years he was confined a close prisoner in the castle of Ham, in Picardy; while his countess, the sister to the great Warwick, was compelled to support herself by the profits of her needle and the secret presents of her friends*. 4. Though the archbishop of York had rendered the king many services, Edward did not feel easy on his throne as long as a Neville remained at liberty. They had hunted together at Windsor; and the king in return promised to hunt with the prelate at the Moor in Hertfordshire. The most magnificent preparations were made for his reception: all the plate, which the archbishop had secreted since the death of his brothers, had been collected; and the principal nobility of the neighbourhood were invited to partake of the entertainment. But Edward sent for him to Windsor, and arrested him on a charge of having lent money to the earl of Oxford. The revenue of his bishopric was seized; his plate confiscated; his mitre converted into a crown; and his jewels divided between the king and the prince of Wales. The prelate lingered in prison for three years, partly in England and partly at Guisnes, and did not recover his liberty till a few weeks before his death in the year 1476. 5. The earl of Pembroke, the uterine brother of Henry, with his nephew the young earl of Richmond, escaped from his town of Pembroke, in which he was besieged, took shipping at Tenby, and was driven by a storm on the coast of Bretagne. The king, as if he had foreseen the severe revenge which that young prince was destined to inflict on the house of York, employed both solicitations and promises to have the uncle and nephew delivered into his hands. But the duke Francis, though he stood in need of the assistance of Edward, refused to betray the exiles. On one occasion, indeed, his resolution was shaken by the offer of the English king to give him his daughter, with a princely portion in marriage, and his promise at the same time to do no injury to the captives. In consequence, Francis delivered one, the young earl of Richmond, to Edward's messengers: but his conscience immediately smote him, and distrusting the intention of the king, he took the earl from them before their embarkation at St. Malo. From that time the two fugitives remained with him in a sort of honourable confinement during the reign of Edward: the reader will see them again in England under that of his successor*. 6. Of the other partisans of the house of Lancaster, the principal, as soon as their hopes were extinguished by the death of Henry and his son, condescended to implore the clemency of Edward; and that prince, having no longer a competitor to fear, listened with greater attention to their petitions. Hence in the next parliament several attainders were reversed in favour of persons whose services might prove useful, or whose influence was too inconsiderable to make them subjects of jealousy. Of these I may mention two, Dr. Morton, parson of Blokesworth, and sir John Fortescue, lord chief justice, who had both been present in the field of Towton, and both been attainted by act of parliament. In their petitions to Edward they use nearly the same expressions. "They are as sorrowful and repentant as any creatures may be, for whatever they have done to the displeasure of the king's highness; and protest that they are and ever will be true liegemen and obedient subjects to him their sovereign lord." Acquainted with the talents of Morton, Edward had already granted him his pardon, and made him keeper of the rolls. Soon afterwards he preferred him to the bishopric of Ely. His attachment to the sons of his benefactor earned for him the enmity of Richard III.: and to his counsels were afterwards ascribed the deposition of that usurper, and the termination of civil discord, by the union of the two roses in the marriage of Henry VII. with the princess Elizabeth. Sir John Fortescue had accompanied Margaret and her son during their exile, and with the title of chancellor was intrusted with the education of the young prince. While he was with Henry in Scotland he had written a treatise in proof of the claim of the house of Lancaster, against that of the house of York. But he could support with equal ability either side of the question, and after the death of Henry wrote a second treatise in proof of the claim of the house of York, against the claim of that of Lancaster. The latter seems to have been required as the price of his pardon. In his petition he assures the king, "that he hath so clearly disproved all the arguments that have been made against his right and title, that now there remaineth no colour or matter of argument to the hurt or infamy of the same right or title by reason of any such writing, but the same right and title stand now the more clear and open by that any such writings have been made against them*."

* See Rot. Parl. vi. 26. 69. He maintained in his first work that Philippa, daughter of Lionel duke of Clarence, through whom the house of York claimed, had never been acknowledged by her father; in the second, that she was his legitimate child and heir. See extracts from both treatises in "The Hereditary Right Asserted," p. 234, 235, and App. i. ii. taken from the Cotton MS. Otho. B. i.—But the most important of the works of this learned judge is his tract De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, which he wrote in exile for the instruction of the young prince, who was murdered after

Thus, after many a bloody field, and the most surprising vicissitudes of fortune, was the head of the house of York seated on the throne of England, apparently without a competitor. His eldest son, who had been born in the sanctuary during his exile, and had also been named Edward, was now created prince of Wales and earl of Chester, and was recognised as the heir-apparent in a great council of peers and prelates *. The partisans of the house of Lancaster had no leader in England: the marauding expeditions of the earl of Oxford had become subjects of ridicule rather than terror; and the king was relieved from all apprehensions on the part of Scotland by the promising state of his negotiations with that kingdom †. His chief disquietude arose from the insatiate rapacity of his brothers, the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester. The immense property of the late earl of Warwick had been derived from two sources, the inheritance of his father the earl of Salisbury, and the possessions of his wife Anne, the heiress to the noble and opulent family of Beauchamp. Clarence, who had married Warwick's eldest daughter, grasped at the

the battle of Tewksbury. He informs his royal pupil that the English is not an absolute but a limited monarchy. In the former, which is the offspring of force and conquest, the will of the prince is the law: in the latter, which arises from the free election of men for their own safety and convenience, the king can neither make laws nor take the goods of his subjects without their consent (c. 9. 12, 13, 14). Of the superior advantages of the latter the prince could have no doubt, if he would contrast the situation of the lower classes in his own country with that of similar classes in France. He would find that the English were better clothed, better fed, and enjoyed in greater abundance the comforts of life (c. 35, 36). He then proceeds to give the preference to the English before the Roman law; 1^o. Because the trial by jury is superior to that by witnesses; and to a question from the young Edward, why then other nations do not adopt it, he replies, that they cannot, because in no other country are there to be found such numbers of substantial yeomen, qualified to serve as jurors; for perjury in a juror was punished with the forfeiture of all property real and personal; and if one might be willing to risk this the others would not (567); 2^o. Because it bastardizes the issue born before wedlock, whereas the civil law legitimates it; 3^o. Because it makes the child of the same condition as the father, not as the mother; 4^o. Because it refuses the guardianship of orphans to those who by law would succeed to their estates, &c. This treatise is deserving of attention, because it shows what notions prevailed at that period respecting the nature of the English constitution, and the liberties of the subject.

whole succession: Gloucester proposed by marrying the younger, the relict of the late prince of Wales, to claim for himself a proportionate share. To defeat the project of his brother, the former concealed the widow from the pursuit of Gloucester: but after some months she was discovered in London in the disguise of a cook-maid, and for greater security was conducted to the sanctuary of St. Martin's. Clarence could not prevent the marriage: but he swore that Gloucester "should not part the lively-hood with him." The king endeavoured to reconcile the two brothers. They pleaded their cause repeatedly before him in council; arbitrators were appointed; and at length an award was given, which, after assigning her portion to Anne, left the rest of the property to Isabella, the elder sister *. All this while the countess their mother was living, and to her belonged by law the possessions of her late brother and father, with the dower settled on her by her husband †. But her interests were disregarded. By act of parliament it was determined that the daughters should succeed as if their mother were dead; that, if either of them should die before her husband, he should continue to enjoy her portion for the term of his natural life; and that if a divorce should be pronounced between Richard and Anne, Richard should still have the benefit of this act, provided he should marry, or do his endeavours to marry, her again ‡. Still the two brothers were not secure. To preclude any claim from the son of the marquess Montague, Warwick's brother, it was enacted that Clarence and Gloucester, and their heirs, should

It is said for certain, that the duke of Clarence maketh himself big in that he can; shewing as (if) he would but deal with the duke of Gloucester: but the king intended to be as big as they both. Some men think that under this there should be some other thing intended, and some treason conspired; so what shall fall, can I not say." Fenn, ii. 127. April 13, 1473.

By these acts of parliament, and the grant of different honours and emoluments, the demands of the royal brothers were satisfied: but a secret hatred had been kindled in their breasts, which was ready to burst forth on the first and most trivial provocation*.

Being at length relieved from all cause of disquietude at home, Edward turned his attention to the concerns of foreign powers. Louis king of France, and Charles le Téméraire, duke of Burgundy, had long been implacable enemies. The latter, with his ally the duke of Bretagne, solicited Edward to prosecute the ancient claim of the English monarchs to the French crown. Gratitude for the services which he had received from his brother-in-law, the desire of punishing Louis for the succours which he had furnished to the house of Lancaster, and above all, the benefit of employing in a foreign war those who, from their former attachments, might be inclined to cabal against his government, induced him to lend a willing ear to the project. Alliances, offensive and defensive, were concluded between him and the two dukes; the partition of their expected conquests was arranged; and the respective quotas, with the payment of their troops were satisfactorily settled. France, according to these treaties, would have been divided into two independent states; of which one, comprehending the northern and eastern provinces, would have belonged to the duke of Burgundy without any obligation of fealty or homage; the other would have been possessed by Edward as the undoubted heir to the ancient monarchs†. The king found the nation willing to embark in the romantic undertaking: the clergy, the lords, and the commons, separately granted him a tenth of their income; and the parliament, which, with different prorogations, continued to sit during two years and a half, voted supply upon supply with unprecedented rapidity *. But an additional aid was obtained 1475 by the king's own ingenuity. He assumed the tone of ^{A. D.} a sturdy beggar, called the more wealthy of the citizens ^{Mar.} before him, and requested from each a present for the ^{24.} relief of his wants. No one presumed to reject the prayer of his sovereign; and considerable sums were thus procured from the shame, the hopes, or the fears, of the donors. Preceding monarchs had repeatedly borrowed on their own security, or that of the parliament: Edward was the first who demanded presents, and facetiously termed the money which he had extorted a benevolence †. We may believe that the sums collected from these different sources exceeded the treasures amassed by any of his predecessors: but it is plain that the historian was not possessed of the gift of prophecy, when he asserted that they would never be equalled on any subsequent occasion ‡.

Though Europe had long resounded with the report of these preparations, from some accident or other the threatened expedition was annually postponed. Edward, however, improved the delay to secure the friendship of the king of Scots. His commissioners offered ample indemnity for all injuries sustained by the Scottish merchants: the long truce reciprocally confirmed; a marriage was contracted between the Duke of Rothsay, the eldest son of James, and Cecily the second daughter of Edward, and the portion of the princess was fixed at twenty thousand marks, to be paid by equal instalments in ten years; a mode of payment which, by making the king of Scots the pensioner, attached him to the interests of the king of England §. A. D. ward proceeded to Sandwich: his army, consisting of 1475 fifteen hundred men-at-arms, and ten times that num-
June ber of archers, was transported to Calais; and Charles
20. duke of Burgundy was invited, according to the treaty, to join the king with his troops. But that prince, who had already wasted his resources by a romantic and un-
July successful expedition into Germany, arrived in the Eng-
4. lish camp with a slender retinue, and offered the best apology in his power for his inability to fulfil his engagements. Edward accompanied him to Peronne, where his chagrin was augmented by the jealousy with which Charles excluded the English from the town. Thence a detachment was sent to occupy St. Quintin's, but the constable of St. Pol, who had been represented as an ally, fired on it from the walls. The king could no longer check the expression of his disappointment; and the duke departed with a promise to return in a short time at the head of a numerous army.

From Sandwich, in conformity with the laws of chivalry, Garter king-at-arms had been despatched to Louis, to make a formal demand of the French crown.
 The monarch heard him with composure, took him into his closet, expressed much esteem for the character of Edward, and a sincere desire to live in amity with so illustrious a prince. He then put three hundred crowns into the hands of the herald, and promised him a thousand more on the conclusion of peace. Won by his liberality and apparent confidence, Garter advised him to apply to the lord Howard or the lord Stanley, as ministers averse from war, and high in the favour of their sovereign. Louis immediately dismissed him, and prepared to avail himself of the information*.

While Edward lay in his camp near Peronne, rumi-nating on the unaccountable conduct of the Burgundian, a French herald addressed himself to the lords Howard and Stanley, and solicited an introduction to the king.

* Com. iv. c. 5—7.

Being admitted, he assured Edward that Louis had never entertained the slightest hostility against him personally; and that, if he had lent assistance on one occasion to the earl of Warwick, it had been solely through his hatred to the duke of Burgundy: he insinuated that the friendship pretended by Charles was hollow and insincere; that he had allured the English into France for his own individual advantage, and that he would desert them the moment he could obtain better terms for himself; and then added that, with a little forbearance on each side, it would be easy for two princes, who mutually esteemed each other, to prevent the effusion of christian blood, and agree to an accommodation equally beneficial to their subjects. By Edward, discontented as he was, the suggestion was received with pleasure. He convoked a council of officers, and a resolution was taken that the king should return with his army to England, if Louis would consent to pay him immediately seventy-five thousand crowns; to settle on him an annuity for life of fifty thousand more; to conclude a truce and commercial intercourse between the two nations for seven years; and to marry his eldest son to Edward's eldest daughter; or, in the event of her death, to her sister Mary, who at the age of puberty should be conveyed to France at the expense of Louis, and receive from him an annual income of sixty thousand francs. The motives assigned by the members for this resolution are, the approach of winter, the poverty of the treasury, and the insincerity of duke Charles*; but to these must be added the presents which Louis distributed among the royal favourites, and the prospect of a supply of money, an object of high importance to a voluptuous and indigent prince. Commissioners on both sides were appointed to meet at a neighbouring village. Louis assented to every demand; and in addition, it was agreed that Margaret of Anjou should be set at liberty on the payment of fifty thousand crowns; and that all differences between the two kings should be submitted to four arbitrators, the cardinal of Canterbury and duke of Clarence on the part of Edward, the archbishop of Lyons and the count of Dunois on the part of Louis, who should be bound to pronounce their award within the course of three years.* As soon as these conditions had been mutually exchanged a bridge was thrown across the Somme at Picquigny near Amiens, on which were erected two lodges, separated from each other by a grating of wood. Here the monarchs met each other, shook hands through the grating, and swore on the missal to observe their engagements. They then entered into familiar conversation; and Louis incautiously invited his new acquaintance to Paris. Edward, eager in the pursuit of pleasure, did not refuse; and it required all the address of the French monarch to postpone the intended visit to an indeterminate period. The English kings, he afterwards observed to his confidants, had been too much in the habit of visiting France; he liked them best on their own side of the water†.

All the immediate conditions of the treaty were faithfully performed. Edward received the money on the appointed day, and instantly commenced his march to the coast; the truce was published, and prolonged for one year after the death of either king; the annual pension, and the sum stipulated for the ransom of queen Margaret, were carefully paid; Edward resigned all power over that princess as his captive, and Louis bound himself never to make any demand in her favour; and she herself, after she was delivered to the French commissioners at Rouen, signed a formal renunciation of all her rights as queen dowager of England‡. Each king congratulated himself on the issue of the expedition. Edward had not only filled his coffers, but had ensured for himself an annual supply of money: Louis, at an expense comparatively small, had escaped from a dangerous war, and had converted a powerful enemy into a faithful ally. To secure this advantage he had purchased the services of many in the English council, who did not hesitate to copy the example of their sovereign. The lord Hastings, Edward's principal favourite, and the chancellor, accepted annual pensions of two thousand crowns each; and twelve thousand more were yearly distributed among the marquess of Dorset, the lords Howard and Cheney, sir Thomas Montgomery, Thomas St. Leger, and a few others. Most of these were not ashamed to recognise themselves as pensioners of the king of France: the lord Hastings alone, though he greedily accepted the money, could never be induced to put his signature to a receipt*.

But though Edward was satisfied, the army and people did not conceal their disappointment. Of the former many accused the avarice of the king, and threatened with public vengeance the counsellors who had suffered themselves to be bribed by Louis: but they were carefully watched, and severely punished for the imprudence of their language. Others, as soon as the army was disbanded, formed associations, extorted money by violence, and threw several counties into confusion by repeated robberies and murders. To suppress these disorders the king directed the laws to be strictly enforced, accompanied the judges in their circuits, and inexorably refused mercy to every delinquent, whatever might have been his station or service. But the dissatisfaction of the people supplied a source of deeper disquietude. It was evident that they wanted only a leader to guide their efforts, and that the imposition of new taxes would infallibly goad them to insurrection. Hence it became the great object of the king's policy to provide for the expenses of his household, and of the government, without laying any additional burden on the nation. With this view he ordered the officers of the customs to exact the duties with severity, extorted frequent tenths from the clergy, levied large sums for the restoration of the temporalities of abbeys and bishoprics, resumed most of the grants lately made by the crown, and compelled the holders of estates, who had omitted any of the numerous minutiae of the feudal tenures to compound by heavy fines for the rents which they had hitherto received. Neither did he disdain the aid which might be derived from commercial enterprise. Edward's ships were annually freighted with tin, wool, and cloth; and the merchandise of the king of England was publicly exposed to sale in the ports of Italy and Greece. In a short time he became rich: though individuals might complain, the nation was satisfied; and men grew insensibly attached to a prince who could support the splendour of the throne without making any general demand on the purses of his subjects*.

It was not, however, long before an event occurred which embittered the remainder of Edward's days. His brother Clarence by the act of resumption had been deprived of several estates, and seems to have considered the loss an unjustifiable aggression. He withdrew from court, could seldom be persuaded to eat at the king's table, and at the council board observed the most obstinate silence. His wife, after the birth of her third child, fell into a state of debility, which, at the expiration of two months, terminated her life; and Ankaret De Twynhyo, one of her female servants, was tried, condemned, and executed on the charge of having administered poison to the duchess†. It chanced that about the same time the duke of Burgundy fell at the siege of Nanci; and his immense possessions devolved on Mary, his only daughter and heir. Clarence solicited her hand; his suit was seconded by all the influence of his sister, the duchess Margaret; and it is thought that he would have succeeded had it not been for the resolute opposition of Edward. The king was too jealous of the ambition of a brother, who might employ the power of Burgundy to win for himself the crown of England, and too apprehensive of incurring the enmity of Louis, who had already seized a considerable portion of Mary's inheritance. From that moment the brothers viewed each other as enemies, and scarcely preserved in their intercourse the external forms of decorum. While they were thus irritated against each other, whether it were the effect of accident, or a preparatory step to the ruin of Clarence, Stacey, one of his servants, was accused of practising the art of magic, and of melting certain images of lead to accelerate the death of the lord Beauchamp. On the rack he named as his accomplice Thomas Burdett, a gentleman in the duke's family. They were arraigned together before the judges and most of the temporal peers; were charged with having calculated the nativities of the king and the prince; and circulated certain rhymes and ballads of a seditious tendency; and, after a short trial, were condemned and executed. On the scaffold both protested against the sentence; Clarence immediately professed himself the champion of their innocence; and the next day Dr. Godard, an eminent divine, was introduced by him into the council chamber to depose to their dying declarations. When these particulars, exaggerated perhaps by officious friends, had been communicated to Edward, he hastened from Windsor to London, sent for the duke, upbraided him with insulting the administration of justice, and in the presence of the mayor and sheriffs committed him to the Tower*.

A parliament was now summoned, and the unfortunate

A. D. 1478. Jan. 16. Clarence stood at the bar of the house of lords under a charge of high treason. Not one of the peers ventured to speak in his favour: the king produced his witnesses, and conducted the prosecution. He described the tender affection which he had formerly cherished for his brother, and the great possessions with which he had enriched him. Yet the ungrateful prince had turned against his benefactor, had leagued with his enemies, had deprived him of his liberty, and during his exile had conspired to dethrone him. All this had been forgiven. Yet what was the return? Clarence had again formed the project of disinheriting him and his issue. For this purpose he had commissioned his servants to give public entertainments, during which they insinuated that Burdett had been innocent of the crime for which he suffered, that the king was himself a magician, and therefore unfit to govern a christian people, and what was more, was a bastard, and consequently without any right to the crown. Moreover, Clarence had induced men to swear that they would be true to him without any reservation of allegiance to their sovereign; had declared that he would recover both for himself and them the lands which had been lost by the act of resumption; had obtained and preserved an attested copy of the act declaring him the next heir to the crown after the male issue of Henry VI.; had sent orders to all his retainers to be in readiness to join him in arms at an hour's notice; and had endeavoured to substitute another person's child in the place of his own son, that he might send the latter out of the kingdom, as if his life were menaced by the enmity of his uncle*. How far these charges against Clarence were true, or whether they amounted to more than precautions against the malice of his enemies, it is impossible for us to decide; for though we know that he replied with warmth and acrimony, his reply has not been preserved. The peers were persuaded by the arguments of the royal accuser; they found Clarence guilty; and the duke of Buckingham, who had been appointed high steward for Feb. the occasion, pronounced on him the sentence of death *. 7. Soon afterwards an act was passed to reverse the judgment of Ankaret; and the commons petitioned the king to execute justice on his brother †. But Edward disapproved of a public exhibition. About ten days later it was announced that the duke had died in the Tower. The manner of his death has never been ascertained; Feb. but a silly report was circulated that he had been 18. drowned in a butt of Malmsey wine ‡.

It was a singular but leading feature in the policy of this king, that he negotiated marriages for his children, almost the very moment they were born. Elizabeth had long been contracted to the dauphin of France, Cecily to the son and heir of the king of Scotland, Anne to the infant son of Maximilian archduke of Austria, and his eldest son to the eldest daughter of the duke of Bretagne. In all these projects he was disappointed, in two of them he was completely overreached. The instalments of the sum to be given with Cecily had for some years been regularly paid: in 1478 they were sus- A. D. 1480. pended, and in 1480 war was declared between England and Scotland. By some writers, the rupture has been attributed to the intrigues of Louis, who secretly stimulated James to break his alliance with Edward; by others, to the policy of Edward, who sought to convert to his own advantage the dissensions between the king and the nobles of Scotland. From public documents it appears that the two princes were highly exasperated against each other. Edward upbraided James with meanness of conduct and breach of faith; and James returned the compliment with the contumelious appellation of "the robber," alluding probably to the manner in which his adversary had acquired the crown *. Great preparations were made: James placed himself at the head of the Scottish, the duke of Gloucester at the head of the English army; and the borderers renewed their depredations: yet two years elapsed before the war assumed a formidable appearance. The king of Scotland, who aspired to the reputation of taste and science, had long avoided the society of his proud but ignorant nobles, and admitted to his company none but a few artists, distinguished indeed in their respective professions, but born in the lower stations of life, and the more hateful in the sight of the natives, because some of them were foreigners. The discontent of the nobility was shared by the duke of Albany and the earl of Mar, the brothers of James, who, to intimidate the factious, suddenly arrested them both, and confined them in separate prisons, the former in the castle of Edinburgh, the other in that of Craigmillar. Albany, by the assistance of the captain of a French vessel, contrived to escape, and eluded the vengeance of his brother, by a voluntary exile in Paris. The unfortunate Mar, on the very doubtful charge of magical practices against the life of the king, was condemned by the council; and though he escaped the ignominy of a public execution, had a vein opened, and bled to death in prison. Revenge rankled in the breast of Albany, who, encouraged by the hostilities between the two powers, came to England, solicited the protection of Edward, and under the pretence that his brother was illegitimate, proclaimed himself king of Scotland *. It was stipulated, that Edward should employ his forces ^{A. D.} to place Albany on the throne, who, in return, should ¹⁴⁸² surrender the town and castle of Berwick; should hold ^{June} the crown as the vassal of the English monarch; should ^{10.} abjure the national alliance with France; and should marry, if the laws of the church would permit (for he had even now two supposed wives living), one of the English princesses. Accompanied by the duke of Gloucester, who led an army of twenty-two thousand five hundred men, he laid siege to Berwick. The town opened its gates, the castle made a most obstinate resistance. James had summoned his retainers, and had advanced as far as Lauder, unaware of the danger which threatened him. It was generally during a military expedition that the Scottish barons made a successful stand against the authority of the sovereign. They were then assembled in a body; they were surrounded with their clans and retainers; and, if they were but united among themselves, they always proved more than a match for the power of the crown. They had met to consult in the church of Lauder, when Cochran the architect, whom the infatuated James had lately created earl of Mar, incautiously joined the assembly. He was instantly seized; six more of the royal favourites were dragged from the king's tent; and all were hanged over the bridge. The confederate chiefs immediately disbanded the army, and conveyed the king to the castle of Edinburgh, menacing him with perpetual imprisonment unless he should grant a full pardon for the murder of his friends †.

‡ The historian of Croyland says only—factum est id, qualecumque erat, genus supplicii, 562. I suspect that the principal cause of Edward's jealousy against Clarence arose from his having been declared the next heir after Edward, the son of Henry VI. Supposing the validity of that act, he was even now the rightful heir; but it was one of the acts mentioned in the last note.

The news of this extraordinary revolution quickly reached the army, which lay before Berwick; and Albany and Gloucester with sixteen thousand men hastened to Edinburgh. That capital received them as friends; and every man expected that the sceptre of Scotland would pass from the feeble hands of its possessor to the firmer grasp of his brother, when, to the astonishment of both nations, Albany signed an agreement with two Scottish peers and two prelates, by which he bound himself to act the part of a faithful subject, they to procure for him a pardon without any exceptions, and the restoration of his estates and honours. It was, however, stipulated, that to satisfy the king of England, the castle of Berwick should be surrendered, and the provost and merchants of Edinburgh should give security for the repayment of all monies advanced on account of the marriage portion of Cecily, unless Edward were willing that the former contract should still subsist. The king, however, demanded the money, which was faithfully repaid. Albany took the castle of Edinburgh by force, and liberated his brother. To prove their reconciliation, they both rode to Holyrood-house on one horse, and slept in the same bed. Yet the restless mind of the duke was not satisfied. He renewed his negotiations with Edward; on the discovery of his traitorous designs escaped again into France, and was at last attainted by an act of the Scottish parliament*.

Another instance in which the expectations of Edward were cruelly disappointed was the projected marriage of his daughter Elizabeth with the dauphin of France. When she had completed her twelfth year it was hoped that Louis, according to his engagement, would have sent for the princess, and have settled on her the stipulated annuity of sixty thousand francs. Four years passed; still she remained in England. Remonstrances were made, but Louis always returned some plausible answer. The parliament warned the king of the artifices of the French court; still he refused to suspect the sincerity of his good brother. An unexpected event opened his eyes. The princess Mary of Burgundy, who had borne her husband Maximilian two children, Philip and Margaret, was unexpectedly killed by a fall from her horse; and Louis, forgetting the princess Elizabeth, instantly demanded Margaret for the dauphin. It was in vain that the father hesitated. The people of Ghent, to whose custody the children had been intrusted, extorted his consent; Margaret was delivered by them to the commissioners of Louis; and the provinces which that monarch had ravished from her mother were settled upon her as her marriage portion. When the news reached Edward, he burst into a paroxysm of rage. From that moment his thoughts were constantly fixed, his conversation generally employed, on the readiest means of inflicting vengeance on the perfidy of the king of France. But whether it were owing to the agitation of his mind, or to the debaucheries in which he indulged, a slight ailment, which had been treated with neglect, suddenly exhibited the most dangerous symptoms. He spent the few days preceding his death in the exercises of religion, and directed that out of the treasures which he should leave behind him full restitution should be made to all whom he had wronged, or from whom he had extorted money under the name of benevolence. He expired in the twenty-first year of his reign.

Edward is said to have been the most accomplished, and, till he grew too unwieldy, the most handsome man of the age. The love of pleasure was his ruling passion. Few princes have been more magnificent in their dress , or more licentious in their amours; few have indulged more freely in the luxuries of the table †. But such pursuits often interfered with his duties, and at last incapacitated him for active exertion. Even in youth, while he was fighting for the throne, he was always the last to join his adherents; and in manhood, when he was firmly seated on it, he entirely abandoned the charge of military affairs to his brother the duke of Gloucester. To the chief supporters of the opposite party he was cruel and unforgiving: the blood which he shed intimidated his friends no less than his foes; and both lords and commons during his reign, instead of contending like their predecessors for the establishment of rights, and the abolition of grievances, made it their principal study to gratify the royal pleasure†. He was as suspicious as he was cruel. Every officer of government, every steward on his manors and farms was employed as a spy on the conduct of all around him: they regularly made to the king reports of the state of the neighbourhood; and such was the fidelity of his memory, that it was difficult to mention an individual of any consequence, even in the most distant counties, with whose character, history, and influence he was not accurately acquainted‡. Hence every project of opposition to his government was suppressed almost as soon as it was formed; and Edward might have promised himself a long and prosperous reign, had not continued indulgence enervated his constitution, and sown the seeds of that malady, which consigned him to the grave in the forty-first year of his age. He was buried with the usual pomp in the new chapel at Windsor§.

* At the Christmas before his death he appeared in a new dress. His robes were furnished with sleeves enormously long and deep, lined with the most precious furs, and folded back on his shoulders: "Novum" says the historian, "et singulare intuentibus spectaculum." Cont. Croyl. 568.

* During the Scottish campaign posts were first established in England. Horsemen were placed at the distance of twenty miles from each other on the road from Scotland to London. They delivered the dispatches from one to another at the rate of 100 miles a day. Cont. Croyl. 571.

† We shall search in vain on the rolls for such petitions as were presented to the throne by the commons in former reigns: but one improvement was firmly established, that of framing the petitions in the form of an act of Parliament: an improvement which prevented any of those alterations in the statutes of which the commons formerly complained. The clerks had now nothing more to do than to copy the words of the petition, and add to it that the king had given his assent.

The king left two sons, Edward in his twelfth year, who succeeded him, and Richard in his eleventh, duke of York, and earl marshal. This young prince had been married in his fifth year to Anne, the daughter and heiress of John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, and thus became entitled to the immense estates of that nobleman. Five of Edward's daughters survived him. Of these four, whom he had so anxiously laboured to place on foreign thrones, found husbands in England. Elizabeth, contracted to the dauphin, was married to Henry VII.; Cecily, the destined wife of the prince of Scotland, to the viscount Welles; Anne, who had been promised to Philip of Burgundy, to Thomas Howard duke of Norfolk; and Catherine, the expected bride of the infant of Spain, to William Courtenay earl of Devon. Conduct of the duke of Gloucester—Arrests—The duke is made Protector—Murder of lord Hastings and the earl Rivers—Penance of Jane Shore—The duke aspires to the crown—Sermon in his favour—Speech of the duke of Buckingham—Offer of the crown to Gloucester—Who accepts it.

A FAINT glimmering of light may be thrown on the dark transactions which followed the death of the late king by adverting to the state of parties at the close of his reign. Whether it were that Edward had been compelled by the importunities of his wife, or that he felt a pride in aggrandizing the family of her whom he had placed by his side on the throne, he had successively raised her relations from the condition of knights and esquires to the highest honours and offices in the state. By the more ancient nobility their rapid elevation was viewed with jealousy and resentment; and their influence, though it appeared formidable, while it was supported by the favour of the king, proved in the sequel to be very inconsiderable, and confined to the few families into which they had married. The marquess of Dorset, the queen's son by a former marriage, and her brother, the accomplished but unfortunate earl Rivers, possessed the first seats at the council board: but they were continually opposed by the lords Hastings, Howard, and Stanley, the king's personal friends, particularly the first, whom Edward had chosen for the companion of his pleasures, and who on that very account was the more odious to the queen. The monarch during his health had balanced by his prudence the rivalry, and silenced by his authority the dissensions, of the two parties; and on his death-bed, warned by the unfortunate minority of Henry VI., had called them into his chamber, exhorted them to mutual forgiveness, and commanded them to embrace in his presence. They obeyed with apparent cheerfulness: but their hearts gave the lie to the sentiments which they uttered, and the lapse of a few days proved how treacherous were all such reconciliations, when he by whose order they had been made no longer lived to enforce them*.

As soon as the king had expired the council assembled, and resolved to proclaim his eldest son by the style of Edward V. But here their unanimity ended. April The young prince, accompanied by his uncle, earl Rivers, and his uterine brother, lord Grey, had been sent to Ludlow in Shropshire, under the pretext that his presence would serve to restrain the natives of Wales; but in reality, that by growing up under their tuition, he might

* More's Works, 38—40, edit. of 1557. For our knowledge of the events of this period we are chiefly indebted to the continuator of the history of Croyland, and sir Thomas More. The first was a contemporary. His name is unknown: but it appears from his work that he was a doctor of canon law, sometimes a member of the council under Edward IV., and occasionally employed by him as envoy to foreign powers (p. 557). He declares that he has written with truth and impartiality. Sine ulla scita intermixtione mendacii, odii, aut favoris. 575. Sir Thomas More was born in 1480. In 1513, when he was under-sheriff of London, he wrote his history of Richard III., according to Rastell, who printed it in 1557 from a copy in More's hand-writing. But Mr. Ellis has observed that the writer speaks of Edward IV. as if he had been present during the last sickness of that monarch, which could not be the case with More, only three years old; and he is therefore inclined to believe that More, was only the copier of a MS. delivered to him by some one else, probably Dr. Morton. become more attached to his maternal relatives. A suspicion was entertained that, in imitation of Isabella, the mother of Edward III., the queen would aspire to a considerable share of authority during the minority of her son; and to defeat her designs, the enemies of the Wydeviles anxiously expected the arrival of the duke of Gloucester, the king's uncle, and the duke of Buckingham, the lineal descendant of Thomas of Woodstock, the youngest son of Edward III. When Elizabeth proposed that Rivers and Grey should conduct Edward from Ludlow to the metropolis under the protection of an army, Hastings and his friends took the alarm. Gloucester and Buckingham were still absent; the Tower was in possession of the marquess of Dorset; the king was surrounded by the queen's creatures; and the addition of an army would place her opponents at her mercy, and enable the Wydeviles to establish their authority. Where, they asked, was the necessity of an army? Who were the enemies against whom it was to be directed? Did the Wydeviles mean to break the reconciliation which they had sworn to observe? A long and angry altercation ensued; Hastings declared that he would quit the court, and retire to his command at Calais; the queen thought it prudent to yield; and in an evil hour the resolution was taken that the retinue of the young king should not exceed two thousand horsemen*.

Richard, duke of Gloucester, was a prince of insatiable ambition, who could conceal the most bloody projects under the mask of affection and loyalty. Having the command of the army against the Scots, he was employed in the marches at the time of his brother's death: but the moment he heard of that event, he repaired to York with a train of six hundred knights and esquires dressed in mourning, ordered the obsequies of the deceased king to be performed with royal magnificence in the cathedral, summoned the gentlemen of the county to swear allegiance to Edward V. ; and, to give them an example, was himself the first who took the oath. At the same time he despatched letters to profess his affection and loyalty to his nephew, to condole with Elizabeth on the loss of her consort, and to offer his friendship to the earl Rivers, and the other lords of the queen's family. Having added to the number of his followers, he proceeded southward, avowedly for the purpose of assisting at the coronation, which had been fixed by the council for the fourth of May*.

With the object of the secret messages which during this interval had passed between the duke, and Buckingham, and Hastings, we are unacquainted : of their import we may form a probable conjecture from the events which immediately succeeded. The young Edward had reached Stony Stratford on his road to London, on the same day on which his uncle arrived at Northampton, about ten miles behind him. The lords Rivers and Grey hastened to welcome Gloucester in the name of the king, and to submit to his approbation the orders which had been framed for the royal entry into the metropolis. They were received with distinction, and invited to dine with the duke, who lavished on them marks of his esteem and friendship. In the evening came the duke of Buckingham with a suite of three hundred horsemen. After supper Rivers and Grey retired to their quarters, highly pleased with their reception : the two princes, left to themselves, arranged the plan of their proceedings for the next day.

In the morning it was discovered that every outlet from the town had been strongly guarded during the night, for the purpose, it was said, of preventing any person from paying his respects to the king before the arrival of his uncle. The circumstance awakened suspicion : but the four lords rode in company, and apparently in friendship, to the entrance of Stony Stratford, when Gloucester suddenly accused Rivers and Grey of having estranged from him the affection of his nephew. They denied the charge, but were immediately arrested, and conducted into the rear. The two dukes proceeded to the house where the king resided, and approached him bending the knee, and professing their loyalty and attachment. But after this outward demonstration of respect, they apprehended sir Thomas Vaughan, and sir Richard Hawse, his confidential servants, ordered the rest of his retinue to disperse, and forbade by proclamation any of them to return into the royal presence under the penalty of death. The prince, abandoned and alarmed, burst into tears; but Gloucester, on his knees, conjured him to dismiss his terrors, to rely on the affection of his uncle, and to believe that these precautions had been rendered necessary by the perfidy of the Wydeviles. He conducted Edward back to Northampton, and ordered the four prisoners to be conveyed under a strong guard to the castle of Pontefract*.

The same evening this mysterious transaction was confidentially announced to the lord Hastings, and soon afterwards was communicated to the queen mother, who, foreboding the ruin of her family, hastily retired with her second son, Richard, her five daughters, and the marquess of Dorset, into the sanctuary at Westminster, and was there lodged in the abbot's apartments. That asylum had formerly been respected by her greatest enemy, the earl of Warwick: it would not, she trusted, be violated by a brother-in-law. The capital was instantly thrown into confusion. The citizens armed themselves; some repaired to Elizabeth in Westminster; others to the lord Hastings in London. That nobleman in general terms assured his friends, what he probably believed himself, that the two dukes were loyal subjects; but their real purpose was preserved an impenetrable secret; and the adherents of the queen, without a leader, and without information, awaited the result in the most anxious uncertainty *.

On the fourth of May, the day originally appointed for the coronation, Gloucester conducted his captive nephew into the metropolis. At Hornsey park they ^{May 4.} were met by the lord mayor and aldermen in scarlet, followed by five hundred citizens in violet. The young king wore a long mantle of blue velvet, his attendants were dressed in deep mourning: Gloucester rode before him with his head bare, and pointed him out to the acclamations of the citizens. He was lodged with all the honours of royalty in the palace of the bishop, and immediately received the fealty and homage of the prelates, lords, and commoners, who were present. A great council had been summoned, and continued to sit during several days. On the motion of the duke of Buckingham the king was removed to the Tower; a distant day, the 22nd of June, was fixed for the coronation; the seals were taken from the archbishop of York and given to the bishop of Lincoln; several officers of the crown were dismissed, to make room for the adherents of the ruling party; and Gloucester, who had been appointed protector, assumed the lofty style of "brother ^{May 27.} and uncle of kings, protectour and defensour, gret chamberlayne, constable, and lord high admiral of England †."

What may have been the original object of this prince can be only matter for conjecture. It is not often that the adventurer discerns at the outset the goal at which he ultimately arrives. The tide of events bears him forward; and past success urges him to still higher attempts. If the duke aspired to nothing more than the protectorate, his ambition was not to be blamed. It was a dignity which the precedents of the two last minorities seemed to have attached to the king's uncle. But it soon appeared that he could not stand so near to the throne, without wishing to place himself on it; and that, when he had once taken his resolve, no consideration of blood, or justice, or humanity, could divert him from his object. He proceeded, however, with that caution and dissimulation which marked his character; his designs were but gradually and partially unfolded; nor did he openly avow his pretension to the crown till he had removed the most trusty of the king's friends, and taken from the rest every hope of opposing him with success.

While orders were issued and preparations made for the expected coronation, Gloucester was busily employed in maturing his plans, and despatching instructions to his adherents. The council met daily at the royal apartments in the Tower: the confidants of the protector at Crosby place, in Bishopsgate-street, his residence in London. These separate meetings did not escape the notice of lord Stanley; but his suspicion was lulled by the assurance of lord Hastings that he had secured the services of a trusty agent, through whom he learned the most secret counsels of Gloucester. The sequel will make it probable that this trusty agent deceived and betrayed him. A summons was issued to forty-eight lords and gentlemen to attend, and receive knighthood preparatory to the coronation of the young king, a measure devised as a blind by the protector; for three days later he despatched orders to his retainers in the north to hasten to London for his protection against the bloody designs of the queen and her kinsmen; and shortly afterwards entering the council-chamber at the Tower, he stood at first in silence knitting his brows, and then in answer to a remark by lord Hastings, called him a traitor, and struck his fist upon the table. A voice at the door exclaimed, "Treason," and a body of ruffians bursting into the room arrested Hastings, Stanley, and the two prelates of York and Ely. The three last were conveyed to separate cells; Hastings was told to prepare for immediate execution. It was in vain that he inquired the cause. The order of the protector would not admit of delay; the first priest who offered himself received his confession; and a piece of timber, which accidentally lay in the green at the door of the chapel, June served for the block on which he was beheaded. A proclamation was issued the same afternoon, announcing that Hastings and his friends had conspired to put to death the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, who had miraculously escaped the snare laid for their destruction*.

On the same day (and the time should be noticed) Ratcliffe, one of the boldest partisans of the protector, at the head of a numerous body of armed men, entered the castle of Pontefract, and made himself master of the lord Grey, sir Thomas Vaughan, and sir Richard Hawse. To the spectators it was announced that they had been guilty of treason: but no judicial forms were observed; and the heads of the victims were struck off in the presence of the multitude†. Two days after- June wards a letter from the duke was delivered by Ratcliffe‡ to the mayor and citizens of York, informing them of the traitorous designs imputed to Elizabeth and the Wydeviles; and four days later proclamations were 19.

† Cont. Croyl. 567. More asserts repeatedly that these murders occurred on the same day as that of lord Hastings. This may be true of the others, but is not correct as to lord Rivers, who was indeed put to death at Pontefract, but a few days later, and by command of the earl of Northumberland. (Rouse, 214.) We have his will dated at Sheriff Hutton on the 23rd of June; a long and elaborate instrument, composed probably under the apprehension, but without any certain knowledge, of the fate which awaited him. If he die beyond the Trent, he directs his body to be buried before our lady of Pewe besides St. Stephen's college at Westminster; otherwise his heart to be taken and buried there. But at the end of the will, immediately after the names of the witnesses, we meet with this affecting and significant passage. "My will is now to be buried before an image of our blessed lady Mary with my lord Richard, in Pontefract; and thou have mercy of my soule, &c." It is plain that this addition was made by him after he had received notice of his approaching execution, and at a moment when any morbid or perturbation of mind prevented him from finishing it. issued in the northern counties, commanding all men "to rise, and come to London under the earl of Northumberland and the lord Neville, to assist in subduing, correcting, and punishing the quene, her blode, and other her adherents, who entended to murder and destroy the protectour and his cousyn the duc of Buckyngham, and the old royal blode of the realm *."

With these proceedings in the north, the inhabitants of London were yet unacquainted: but the murder of Hastings, and the arrest of Stanley and the two prelates, had liberated Richard from all apprehensions on the part of those who were most attached to the family of the late king. Of the royal brothers the elder had been securely lodged in the Tower; the younger still remained in sanctuary under the eye of Elizabeth. Him also the protector resolved to have at his mercy; and before the terror created by the late execution could subside, he proceeded to Westminster in his barge, accompanied by several noblemen and prelates, and followed by a numerous body of armed men. There cannot be a doubt that he intended to employ force, if force should be found necessary; but he determined to try first the influence of persuasion, and ordered a deputation of lords with the cardinal of Canterbury at their head, to enter and demand the young prince from his mother. The ingenious arguments which sir Thomas More has attributed to the prelate, and the affecting replies which he has put into the mouth of the queen, are probably the composition of the writer†: a better authority assures us that Elizabeth, convinced of the inutility of resistance, affected to acquiesce with cheerfulness in the demand. She called for her boy, gave him a last

* See the originals in Drake's Eboracum, 115. It is observable that on the 8th Richard wrote to the citizens of York a capital letter, promising to reward them for their constant attachment to him: and two days later on the 10th, but three days before the murders in the Tower and at Pontefract, he wrote again to inform them of the plots against his life by the queen and her friends. The letter was five days on the road, and was delivered by Ratcliffe to the mayor.

and hasty embrace, and turning her back, burst into tears. The innocent victim was conducted with great pomp to the Tower; and while the mother abandoned herself to the prophetic misgivings of her heart, her sons made themselves happy in the company of each other, little suspecting the wiles and cruelty of their unnatural uncle*.

The partisans of the protector were now employed in circulating the most strange and incredible rumours. Some revived the tale originally invented by Clarence, that the late king, though the reputed son of the duke of York, was in reality the fruit of an adulterous intercourse between his mother Cecily and a knight in the service of her husband. Others, and in greater numbers, affected to throw doubts on the validity of his marriage with Elizabeth, and consequently on the legitimacy of his children by that lady. To aid these impressions the protector appeared in a new character, that of the patron and avenger of public morals. Among the married women who were known to have yielded to the unprincipled desires of Edward, was Jane, the wife of Shore, a young and opulent citizen. From the moment that her seduction became public, she had been abandoned by her husband; and notwithstanding the inconstancy of her lover, had contrived to retain the principal place in the king's affections till the time of his death. This woman, whose husband was now dead, Richard singled out for punishment. Her plate and jewels, to the value of three thousand marks, he very June wisely appropriated to himself: her person he delivered over to the ecclesiastical court to be punished according to the canons. In her kirtle, with her feet bare, carrying a lighted taper in her hand, and preceded by the cross, Shore was compelled to walk through the streets of the capital, lined with an immense concourse of people*. That her penance could not affect the title of Edward's children, is evident; but it served to direct the attention of the public to the dissolute conduct of that monarch, and to prepare men for the marvellous scene which was soon to be exhibited.

By this time the retainers of the late lord Hastings, and a numerous body of Welshmen, had joined the duke of Buckingham; and the ruffians who had murdered the prisoners at Pontefract had reached the neighbourhood of London with a force of Yorkshiremen. It was believed that, in the course of the week, the protector and the duke would have twenty thousand armed men under their command in the metropolis†. In these circumstances no danger could be apprehended from the public exposure of Gloucester's object. On June 22. the next Sunday, therefore, he appointed Dr. Shaw, the brother of the lord mayor, to preach at St. Paul's cross, who selected for his text the following passage of the Book of Wisdom: "Bastard slips shall not strike deep roots." Having maintained from different examples that children were seldom permitted to enjoy the fruit of their father's iniquity, he proceeded to describe the well-known libertinism of the late king, who, he averred, had been in the habit of promising marriage to every woman whom he found it difficult to seduce. Thus, in the beginning of his reign, to gratify his passion, he had not hesitated to contract marriage in private with Eleanor, the widow of the lord Boteler of Sudely‡; and after-

* More, 56, 57. He gives her in one respect a commendable character. wards had married in the same clandestine manner Elizabeth, the widow of sir John Grey. At a subsequent period he had thought proper to acknowledge the second contract. but such acknowledgment could not annul the prior right of Eleanor, who in the eyes of God and man was the true wife of the king. Hence the preacher concluded that Elizabeth, though admitted as queen of England, could be considered in no other light than a concubine; and that her children by Edward had no legitimate claim to the succession of their father. Indeed, he entertained a doubt, whether that prince were in reality the son of Richard duke of York, and real heir to the crown. All who had been acquainted with the duke must know that there existed no resemblance between him and Edward. "But," he exclaimed (and at the very moment the protector, as if by accident, passing through the crowd, showed himself from a balcony near the pulpit), "here, in the duke of Gloucester, we have the very picture of that hero: here every lineament reflects the features of the father." It was expected that at these words the citizens would have exclaimed, "Long live king Richard;" but they gazed on each other in silent astonishment; the protector put on an air of displeasure; and the preacher having hastily concluded his sermon, slunk away to his home. It is said that he never afterwards ventured beyond his own door, but pined away through shame and remorse*.

Richard, however, was not disheartened by the failure

* More, 60, 61. This sermon is rejected by the author of the Historic Doubts. That several of the speeches recorded by sir Thomas More are mere rhetorical exercises, is indeed probable; but it is equally probable that in mentioning this public and celebrated sermon, which was still in the recollection of many of his readers, he would preserve at least its substance. The principal part of his narrative is moreover corroborated by the testimony of Wabyan (p. 514, 515), who was probably present. To the objection that the protector lived in habits of friendship with his mother, and therefore would not allow her character to be aspersed, it may be replied that there is no satisfactory proof of that friendship, and that the man who could shed the blood of two nephews to procure the crown, would not refuse to allow the character of his mother to be slandered for the same purpose.

of this attempt; but intrusted his cause to the eloquence of a more noble advocate. On the next Tuesday the duke of Buckingham, attended by several lords and gentlemen, harangued the citizens from the hustings at the Guildhall. He reminded them of Edward's tyranny, of the sums which he had extorted under the name of benevolence, and of the families which he had rendered unhappy by his amours. He then took occasion to allude to the sermon which they had heard on the last Sunday, the story of the king's pre-contract with the lady Boteler, his subsequent union with the lady Grey, and the illegitimacy of the children, the fruit of that pretended marriage. He added, that evidently the right to the crown was in Richard duke of Gloucester, the only true issue of the duke of York, and that the lords and commons of the northern counties had sworn never to submit to the rule of a bastard. Contrary to his expectation, the citizens were still silent: he at length required an answer, whether it were in favour of the protector or not; and a few persons, hired for the purpose, and stationed at the bottom of the hall, having thrown up their bonnets, and exclaimed, "King Richard," the duke gave the assembly his thanks for their assent, and invited them to accompany him the next day to Baynard's castle, which was at that time the residence of the duke of Gloucester*.

In the morning Buckingham, with many lords and gentlemen, and Shaw, the lord mayor, with the principal citizens, proceeded to the palace, and demanded an audience†. The protector affected to be surprised at their

* More, 61—65. Feb. 515.

† A parliament had been summoned for this very day, and Buckingham would take advantage of the arrival of the members to induce many of them to accompany him. But there is no reason to believe that any parliament was regularly held, though there exists among the Cotton MS. (Vitel. E. 10) a copy of a speech, with which the bishop of Lincoln, the chancellor, is supposed to have opened it, beginning with a text from the service of the Feast of St John the Baptist, kept on the 24th, the day before. The chancellor, unaware of the revolution which was about to take place, had prepared his speech, which, though never spoken, has accidentally been preserved.

arrival; expressed apprehensions for his safety; and when at last he showed himself at a window, appeared before them with strong marks of embarrassment and perturbation. Buckingham, with his permission, presented to him an address, which, having been afterwards embodied in an act of parliament, still exists for the information of posterity. It is styled the consideration, election, and petition of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons of this realm of England; and after an exaggerated picture of the former prosperity of the kingdom, and of its misery under the late king, proceeds thus: "Also we consider how the pretended marriage betwixt the above-named king Edward and Elizabeth Grey was made of great presumption, without the knowing and assent of the lords of this land, and also by sorcery and witchcraft committed by the said Elizabeth and her mother Jacquetta, duchess of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people, and the public voice and fame is throughout all this land, and hereafter, if, and as the case shall require, shall be proved sufficiently in time and place convenient; and here also we consider how that the said pretended marriage was made privily and secretly, without edition of banns, in a private chamber, a profane place, and not openly in the face of the church after the law of God's church, but contrary thereunto, and the laudable custom of the church of England; and how also that at the time of the contract of the said pretended marriage, and before and long after, the said king Edward was and stood married and troth-plight to one dame Eleanor Butteler, daughter of the old earl of Shrewsbury, with whom the said king Edward had made a pre-contract of matrimony long time before he made the said pretended marriage with the said Elizabeth Grey in manner and form aforesaid; which premises being true, as in very truth they be true, it appeareth and followeth evidently that the said king Edward, during his life, and the said Elizabeth, lived together sinfully

"and damnably in adultery against the law of God and of his church. Also it appeareth evidently and followeth, that all the issue and children of the said king Edward be bastards, and unable to inherit or to claim any thing by inheritance by the law and custom of England." Next is recited the attainder of the duke of Clarence, by which his children were debarred from the succession; and thence it is inferred that the protector is the next heir to Richard late duke of York. "And hereupon," continues the petition, "we humbly desire, pray, and require your noble grace, that according to this election of us the three estates of your land, as by your true inheritance, you will accept and take upon you the said crown and royal dignity, with all things thereunto annexed and appertaining, as to you of right belonging, as well by inheritance as by lawful election *."

The protector was careful not to dispute the truth of these assertions. But he replied with modesty, that he was not ambitious: that royalty had no charms for him: that he was much attached to the children of his brother, and resolved to preserve the crown that it might grace the brows of his nephew. "Sir," returned the duke of Buckingham, "the free people of England will never crouch to the rule of a bastard, and if the lawful heir refuse the sceptre, we know where to find one who will cheerfully accept it." At these words Richard affected to pause: and after a short silence replied, "that it was his duty to obey the voice of his people: that since he was the true heir and had been chosen by the three estates, he assented to their petition, and

* Rot. Parl. vi. 240, 241. Cont. Croyl. 567. But was there ever any such person as dame Eleanor Butzeler, daughter of the old earl of Shrewsbury? We know so little about her, that her existence has been called in question. There is, however, in the possession of lord Shrewsbury, an illuminated pedigree by Glover in 1580, in which she is named as the first-born of the second marriage of the first earl (with a daughter of Beauchamp, earl of Warwick), and as wife of sir Thomas Butler, lord Sudeley. If this be correct, there must have been the disparity of at least fifteen years, probably of more, between her age and that of Edward.

"would from that day take upon himself the royal estate, pre-eminence, and kingdom of the two noble realms of England and France; the one from that day forward by him and his heirs to rule, the other by God's grace and their good help to get again and subdue*."

Thus ended this hypocritical farce. The next day Richard proceeded to Westminster in state, and took June possession of his pretended inheritance by placing himself on the marble seat in the great hall, with the lord Howard, afterwards duke of Norfolk, on his right hand, and the duke of Suffolk on his left. To those present he stated that he had chosen to commence his reign in that place, because the administration of justice was the first duty of a king; and ordered proclamation to be made that he forgave all offences which had been committed against him before that hour. From Westminster he went to St. Paul's, where he was received by the clergy in procession, and welcomed with the acclamations of the people. From that day, the 26th of June, he dated the commencement of his reign†.

Coronation of Richard—Death of his two nephews—Conspiracy against him defeated—Is reconciled with Elizabeth—Wishes to marry his niece—Raises an army against the earl of Richmond—Is killed in the battle at Bosworth.

THE preparations which had been made for the coronation of the nephew served for that of the uncle ; and the arrival of Ratcliffe, with four thousand armed men from the north, dispelled all fear of opposition from the friends of the Wydeviles. In less than a fortnight from his acceptance of the petition at Baynard's castle, Richard was crowned at Westminster with his consort Anne, the daughter of the late earl of Warwick*. No expense was spared to give splendour to the ceremony : almost all the peers and peeresses graced it with their presence ;

* In the contemporary account of this coronation we are told that the anointing was performed in the following extraordinary manner : "Then the kyng and quene put of ther robes, and there (at the high altar) stode all nakyd "from the medell upwards, and anone the Bushope anoynted bothe the kyng "and the quyne." Excerpt: Hist. 381. This statement, however, must not be taken literally. The king, at his coronation, after he had been disrobed of his mantle and surcoat by his chamberlain, remained in a close dress of crimson satin, in which openings had been already prepared for the anointments on his back, breast, shoulders, and elbows. The queen was anointed on the forehead and the chest only ; so that one opening sufficed in her dress, which was unlaced and relaxed by the lady in waiting. A large pall or awning was held over them during the ceremony. See the device for the coronation, in Rutland Papers, p. 8, 9, 16, 20. See also Selden, Titles of Honour, c. viii.

and it was remarked that the train of the king was borne by the duke of Buckingham, that of the queen by the countess of Richmond, both descendants of John of Ghent, and the heads of the house of Lancaster*.

The new king employed the first days of his reign in acts of favour and clemency. The lord Stanley, the husband of the countess of Richmond, had not only appeased his jealousy, but was appointed steward of the household, and afterwards constable of England; the archbishop of York regained his liberty; Morton, bishop of Ely, was released from his dungeon in the Tower, and committed to the custody of the duke of Buckingham in the castle of Brecknock; the lord Howard obtained the office of earl marshal, with the title of duke of Norfolk: his son was created earl of Surrey; many of the nobility were raised to a higher rank; and the treasures amassed and left by Edward were lavishly employed in the reward of past, and the purchase of future services.

Richard had of late affected an extraordinary zeal for the suppression of crime, and the reformation of manners. Before their departure he called the lords before him and admonished them to keep the peace in their counties, and to assist his officers in the apprehension and punishment of offenders. Within a few days he followed them himself, declaring it to be his intention to July travel through the kingdom for the same purpose. His²³ progress was slow. In all the great towns he administered justice in person, listened to petitions, and dispensed favours†. The inhabitants of Oxford, Woodstock, Gloucester, and Worcester, were honoured with

* Cont. Croyl. 567. Hall, 25, 26. In the Historic Doubts (p. 65) we are told that the deposed prince walked in the procession; because it appears that robes were ordered for him and his henchmen or pages. The inference is far from correct, as the robes charged in the roll (Archæol. i. 372, 373) are probably those which had been ordered and made for Edward's own coronation. To have forced him to walk on such an occasion would have been a dangerous experiment: nor could it have escaped the notice of the contemporary writers, who mention the principal personages.

† Apud Drake, Eborac. 116.

- Aug. his presence: at Warwick he was joined by the queen,
 8. the Spanish ambassadors, and many of the nobility; and the court, after a week's residence in that city, proceeded,
 15. through Coventry, Leicester, Nottingham, and Pontefract, to York*. The inhabitants had been previously
 21. warned to display every mark of joy, "that the southern lords might mark the resaying of their graces." The gentlemen of the neighbourhood had received orders to attend, and to do the king homage; and part of the royal wardrobe had been forwarded from London, that Richard and his queen might appear in their most splendid dresses. To please the men of the north, among whom he had for some years been popular, he was again crowned with his consort; and the ceremony was performed with the same pomp and pageantry which had been exhibited in the metropolis†.

While Richard was thus spending his time in apparent security at York, he was apprised of the tempest which had been gathering behind him. The terror of his presence had before silenced the suspicions of the public: but he was no sooner gone, than men freely communicated their thoughts to each other, commiserated the lot of the young Edward and his brother in the Tower, and openly condemned the usurpation of the crown by their unnatural uncle. Different plans were suggested. Some proposed to liberate the two princes from their confinement: others preferred the less dangerous measure of conveying one or more of their sisters beyond sea, that, whatever might be the subsequent policy of Richard, the posterity of his brother might survive to claim, perhaps to recover, the crown. But the king, though it was unknown, had already guarded against the first of these projects by the murder of his nephews; and to prevent the second, he had ordered John Nesfield to surround the sanctuary of Westminster with a body of armed men, and to refuse ingress or egress to any person without a special license . Meanwhile the friends of the princes steadily pursued their object. In Kent, Essex, and Sussex, in Berkshire, Hants, Wilts, and Devonshire, meetings were privately held; a resolution was taken to appeal to arms; and the hopes of the confederates were raised by the unexpected accession of a most powerful ally. What, in the course of a few weeks could have changed the duke of Buckingham from a zealous friend into a determined enemy to the new king, it is in vain to conjecture. If his services to Richard had been great, they had been amply rewarded. He had been made constable of England, justiciary of Wales, governor of the royal castles in that principality, and steward of the king's manors in Hereford and Shropshire; and in addition had obtained the opulent inheritance of Humphrey de Bohun, which the late monarch had unjustly annexed to his own demesnes †. Perhaps his knowledge of the cruel and suspicious character of the usurper had taught him to fear that he himself, to whom the Lancastrians looked up for protection, might be the next victim: perhaps, as has been said, his opinions were changed by the artful and eloquent observations of his prisoner Morton. However that may be, Buckingham, whose wife was the sister of Elizabeth, engaged to restore the crown to the young prince, whom he had contributed to dethrone; and his resolution to put himself at the head of the party was communicated in circular letters to the principal of the confederates. At that very moment, when their hearts beat with the confidence of success, their hopes were suddenly dashed to the ground by the mournful intelli-† Bohun had left two daughters, who divided his property between them. One married Henry IV., the other an ancestor of the duke. gence that the two princes for whom they intended to fight, were no longer alive.

On what day, or in what manner they perished, was kept a profound secret: the following is the most consistent and probable account, collected from the confession made by the murderers in the next reign. Soon after his departure from London, Richard had tampered in vain with Brakenbury, the governor of the Tower. From Warwick he despatched sir James Tyrrel, his master of the horse, with orders that he should receive the keys and the command of the fortress during twenty-four hours. In the night Tyrrel, accompanied by Forest, a known assassin, and Dighton, one of his grooms, ascended the staircase leading to the chamber in which the two princes lay asleep. While Tyrrel watched without, Forest and Dighton entered the room, smothered their victims with the bed-clothes, called in their employer to view the dead bodies, and by his orders buried them at the foot of the staircase. In the morning Tyrrel restored the keys to Brakenbury, and rejoined the king before his coronation at York. Aware of the execration to which the knowledge of this black deed must expose him, Richard was anxious that it should not transpire; but when he understood that men had taken up arms to liberate the two princes, he suffered the intelligence of their death to be published, that he might disconcert the plans, and awaken the fears of his enemies†.

The intelligence was received with horror both by the friends and the foes of the usurper; but, if it changed the object, it did not dissolve the union of the conspirators. They could not retrace their steps with security; and since the princes for whom they had intended to

Objections have been raised against it, but I hope to show that they are of no weight in note [D] at the end of this volume.—Carte attributes the story of the death of the princes to Buckingham and his friends, as if it were intended to aid the insurrection (iii. 823); from the Croyland historian it is certain that it was published by others, and had at first the effect of disconcerting all their projects. fight were no longer alive, it became necessary to set up a new competitor in opposition to Richard. The bishop of Ely proposed that the crown should be offered to Henry the young earl of Richmond, the representative, in right of his mother, of the house of Lancaster*, but on the condition that he should marry the princess Elizabeth, to whom the claim of the house of York had now devolved; a marriage which, the prelate observed, would unite the partizans of the two families in one common cause, enable them to triumph over the murderer, and put an end to those dissensions which had so long convulsed and depopulated the nation. The suggestion was approved by the queen dowager, the duke of Buckingham, the Marquess of Dorset, and most of their

* If Margaret, countess of Richmond, was the great-grand-daughter of John of Ghent, so was Margaret countess of Stafford, the mother of Buckingham; but as the father of the former was an elder brother, she was deemed the head of the house of Lancaster, and had married Edmund earl of Richmond, the son of queen Catherine by Owen Tudor—Buckingham was descended also from Thomas duke of Gloucester, sixth son of Edward III. The new plan of the confederates escaped the vigilance of the king, who, ignorant of his danger, proceeded from York into Lincolnshire: but in a fortnight the answer of Henry was received, and was no sooner communicated to his friends than it reached the ears of Richard. To prepare for the contest, he summoned all his

 18. purpose at Maidstone; those of Berkshire at Newberry; and the duke of Buckingham unfurled his standard at Brecon‡.

Five days later, Richard joined his army at Leicester, where he issued a most singular proclamation. He begins by boasting of his zeal for morality and the administration of justice; then calls his enemies "traitors, adulterers, and bawds;" asserts that their object is not only the destruction of the throne, but "the letting of virtue, and the damnable maintenance of vice:" grants a free pardon to all yeomen and commoners who have been deluded by the false pretensions of the rebels; threatens with the punishment of treason all who shall hereafter lend them assistance; and promises rewards for the apprehension of Buckingham and his associates§. But Richard's good fortune served him better than his troops or his proclamations. Had Henry landed, or had the duke been able to join the other insurgents, the reign of the usurper would probably have been terminated. But though Henry had sailed from St. Malo with a fleet of forty sail, the weather was so tempestuous that but few could follow him across the Channel; and when he reached the coast of Devon, the insufficiency of his force forbade him to disembark. Buckingham was still more unfortunate. From Brecon he had marched through the forest of Deane to the Severn; but the bridges were broken down, and the river was so swoln that the fords had become impassable. He turned back to Weobley, the seat of the lord Ferrers: but the Welshmen who had followed him disbanded; and the news of their desertion induced the other bodies of insurgents to provide for their own safety. Thus the king triumphed without drawing the sword. Weobley was narrowly watched on the one side by sir Humphrey Stafford, on the other by the clan of the Vaughans, who for their reward had received a promise of the plunder of Brecon. Morton effected his escape in disguise to the isle of Ely, and thence passed to the coast of Flanders; the duke in a similar dress reached the hut of Banister, one of his servants in Shropshire, where he was betrayed by the perfidy of his host. If he hoped for pardon on the merit of his former services, he had mistaken the character of Richard. That prince had already reached Salisbury with his army: he refused to see the prisoner, and ordered his head to be immediately struck off in the market-place. From Salisbury he marched into Devonshire. The insurgents dispersed: the marquess of Dorset, and Courtenay bishop of Exeter, crossed the Channel to the coast of Bretagne; and others found an asylum in the fidelity of their neighbours, and the respect which was still paid to the sanctuaries. Of the prisoners, St. Leger, a knight, had married the duchess of Exeter, the sister of Richard. But it was in vain that the plea of affinity was urged in his favour, and a large sum of money offered for his ransom. By the king's order he suffered with others at Exeter*.

When the conqueror had traversed the southern counties, and by repeated executions punished such of his enemies as fell into his hands, he returned to the capital, and summoned a parliament. This assembly, like those of the last reign in similar circumstances, Nov. proved its loyalty by its eagerness to anticipate every 11. wish of the monarch†. It adopted and confirmed the celebrated petition presented to Richard during his protectorate; pronounced him "undoubted king of this "realm of England as well by right of consanguinity "and inheritance, as by lawful election, consecration "and coronation;" and entailed the crown on the issue of his body, particularly his son, Edward prince of Wales, whose succession the lords spiritual and temporal bound themselves to uphold. Then followed a bill of attainder, which, though a common measure in these turbulent times, is said to have been severe and comprehensive beyond all precedent. One duke, one marquess, three earls, three bishops, with many knights and gentlemen, were deprived of their estates, honours, and rights. The forfeitures were employed partly to augment the revenue of the crown, partly to remunerate the king's northern adherents, who were thus transplanted into the southern counties, and converted into spies on the disaffection of their neighbours. Among the attainted was the countess of Richmond. But she was spared from execution at the intercession of her husband the lord Stanley, who had convinced Richard of his own loyalty, and who, on his promise to watch over the conduct of his consort, was permitted to retain the possession of her estates during his life‡.

As the marriage between Edward IV. and Elizabeth Grey had now been declared null by the approbation given to the petition presented at Baynard's castle, their son was officially termed "Edward the bastard, lately called Edward the fifth:" his mother was designated Elizabeth late wife of sir John Grey, and the letters patent were annulled by which she had been entitled to her dower as queen of England*. Still the king was seriously alarmed at the idea of a marriage between the young earl of Richmond and the eldest of her daughters. At the last festival of Christmas a meeting had been held at Rhedon in Bretagne, where Henry solemnly swore to make her his queen as soon as he should triumph over the usurper; and the exiles to the number of five hundred had on that condition promised him fealty, and done homage to him as to their sovereign. It was not that Henry of himself could advance any right to the crown. By the father's side he was descended from Owen Tudor and Catherine, the relict of Henry V.: by the mother's from John Beaufort earl of Somerset, the natural son of John of Ghent by Catherine Swynford. Somerset, indeed, had been legitimated: but the reader is aware that an act of parliament had expressly excluded him and his posterity from the succession to the crown. There were still in Spain and Portugal princes and princesses of the house of Lancaster: but they despised or neglected a disputed title, and the partisans of the family looked up to Henry and his mother as their natural chiefs. Under no circumstances, much less under these, would the lords attached to the house of York have admitted the claim of the earl of Richmond. But convinced of the death of the two sons of Edward, they considered his eldest daughter as rightful sovereign; and the moment Henry bound himself by oath to marry that princess, they swore fealty to him as the future husband of her, who was by succession queen of England.

To defeat this project now became the chief policy of

A. D. Richard. That he might draw the late queen out of the

Mar. 1. Message after message was interchanged; and at last a private treaty was concluded, in consequence of which he swore in the presence of several lords and prelates, and the mayor and aldermen, that she and her daughters should be treated by him as his kinswomen; that their lives should be in no danger; that the mother should possess an annuity of seven hundred marks for life; and that each of the daughters should receive lands to the value of two hundred marks as a marriage portion, and be married to none but gentlemen*. Induced by these promises she repaired with her family to court: both mother and daughters were kindly received; and marks of peculiar distinction were lavished upon young Elizabeth, whom Richard had probably destined to be wife of his son Edward. But that prince suddenly ex-

April 9.pired at Middleham, and the king and his consort were for a time inconsolable on account of their loss†. What Richard's designs might now be with respect to Elizabeth were unknown; but she was attached to the company of the queen, and thus kept in real though honourable captivity.

At length the king had leisure to direct his attention to Bretagne, where the earl of Richmond and the exiles were busily employed in devising the means of expelling him from the throne. No expense was spared to procure the most accurate information of their numbers and projects; and the useful aid of Landois, the Breton minister, was purchased with valuable presents. The duke Francis listened by degrees to the suggestions of his favourite: an armistice between the two nations prepared the way for more frequent intercourse; the king raised a body of a thousand archers for the service of his new friend; and a dark plot was framed for the apprehension of Henry and of his principal adherents*. They would have been caught in the toils of their wily adversary had they not been warned of their danger, and found a new and safer asylum in the dominions of Charles VIII. king of France, where they employed more than a year in making new preparations for their intended expedition.

During the interval Richard put an end to the tedious and destructive hostilities between the Scots and his subjects. The duke of Albany and the earl Douglas had received from him the same protection which on a former occasion they had received from his brother: but he was too much occupied with his own concerns to lend them effectual aid; and their efforts were confined to occasional inroads by land, and piratical depredations by sea. During this summer they had attempted to surprise the merchants at the fair of Lochmaben; but were repulsed with considerable loss, and the capture of Douglas and several of his English associates. This disgrace, however, was more than compensated by the success of the English cruizers against the commerce of Scotland; and at the solicitation of James an armistice for three years, and an alliance by marriage between the royal families of the two kingdoms, was concluded at Nottingham. Richard, indeed, after the death of his ^{Sept.} son, was without legitimate children: but he had declared John earl of Lincoln, and son of his sister the duchess of Suffolk, heir apparent to the crown; and he now affianced the sister of that young prince, Anne de la Pole, to the eldest son of the king of Scotland. It was mutually stipulated that the marriage should take place as soon as the parties had arrived at the age of puberty†.

At Christmas the king kept his court in the palace of † Rym. xii. 233—246. Rouse informs us that the young earl of Warwick, the son of the late duke of Clarence, was treated at first as heir apparent; but that after some time he was removed, put into close custody, and the young earl of Lincoln substituted for him.—p. 218.

Westminster. Whether it were from policy or inclination, he affected extraordinary magnificence: the holidays were a constant repetition of feasting, balls, and amusements; and it was remarked with surprise that in every company his niece Elizabeth appeared in robes exactly similar to those worn by the queen consort. Before men could discover the cause of this unusual arrangement the latter suddenly fell sick; and Richard, in expectation of her death, offered his hand to his niece. Her mother is said not to have disapproved of the unnatural union, but to have written to her son the marquess of Dorset at Paris, and to have ordered him to retire from the councils of Henry. The princess herself, in a letter which she wrote to the duke of Norfolk, showed how much she was dazzled with the splendours of royalty. She solicited the good offices of that nobleman in her favour, protested that the king was "her joy and maker in this world, and that she was his in heart and thought," and hinted her surprise at the duration of the queen's illness, and her apprehensions "that she would never die ." These apprehensions, however, were soon quieted: in less than a month the queen expired; and Elizabeth was flattered with the idea of mounting the throne, Richard with the prospect of disconcerting by this marriage the machinations of his rival. But when the king communicated the plan to Ratcliffe and to Catesby, "knight and esquire of the body," both confidants by whose advice he was generally ruled, he experienced an unexpected and most obstinate opposition. Their objection perhaps arose, as the historian surmises, from a well-grounded apprehension, that if Elizabeth should become queen, she would revenge on them the murder of her uncle and brother at Pontefract: but their arguments, whatever were their secret motives, deserved the most serious attention of their master. They represented to him that this incestuous marriage would be an object of horror to the people, and would be condemned by the clergy; that suspicions were already entertained of his having removed the queen by poison to make room for the niece; that to marry her in the present circumstances would convert such suspicions into a certainty, and would in consequence deprive him of his staunchest adherents, the men of the northern counties, for whose support he had been hitherto indebted to the respect which they bore to his late consort, as daughter of the great earl of Warwick. The king, though with considerable reluctance, yielded to their remonstrances. In the great hall of the Temple he assured the mayor, aldermen, and commoners, that no such marriage had ever been contemplated; and by a Ap letter to the citizens of York, required them to refuse 11. credit to the slanderous tales which had been circulated, and to apprehend and bring before the council all persons known to advance or propagate reports to his prejudice†.

As the time approached, in which the contest for the crown was to be decided, the mind of Richard became the prey of doubts and apprehensions. It may be that the disturbed rest, the imaginary spectres, and the sudden terrors described by sir Thomas More, were the fictions of his enemies‡: but, unfurnished as he was with

* From the expressions in Elizabeth's letter mentioned before, there is reason to fear that this suspicion was too true. It is evident Richard had not only promised to marry her, but had told her that the queen would die in February. Hence she observes that the better part of February is past, and the queen still alive. Buck, p. 568.

† See the whole account in the Croyland Historian, 572. The letter to the citizens of York is in Drake's Eboracum, p. 119. That writer supposes it to have been written in 1484. But as it alludes to the reports about the marriage, and observes that the king had already explained matters to the citizens of London, which the Croyland Historian says he did some time before Easter, I have no difficulty in fixing it to the present year.

‡ "I have heard by credible report of such as were secret with his chamberers, that he never had quiet in his mind, never thought himself sure. When he went abroad, his eyes whirled about, his body privily fenced, his hand ever on his dagger, his countenance and manner like one always ready to strike again. He took ill rests at night, lay long waking and musing, sore worried with care and watch, rather slumbered money, and suspicious of his adherents, he could not look forward to a contest, in which his crown and life were at stake, without feeling considerable alarm. The treasures left by his brother, the monies arising from the late forfeitures, and three tenths obtained from the clergy, had all been expended. He dared not summon a parliament for the purpose of demanding a subsidy: and to solicit a benevolence he had already pronounced illegal and unconstitutional. Yet his necessities compelled him to adopt the thing, while he refused it the name. and though by extorting different sums from the most wealthy of the citizens, he replenished his coffers, he forfeited at the same time the small share which he retained in their affection*. He no longer knew whom to trust or distrust. Daily defections taught him to suspect the fidelity of the most attached among his adherents. Sir Walter Blount, the governor of Ham, deserted to Henry with his prisoner, the old earl of Oxford: several officers of the garrison of Calais, and the sheriffs of some counties, followed their example; and numerous emigrations from the coast doubled the amount of the exiles. But no one gave him more anxiety than lord Stanley, a nobleman of extensive influence in Cheshire and Lancashire. On the one hand he had hitherto served Richard with unwearied zeal; on the other he had married the mother of the pretender to the crown. To attach him the more firmly to the royal interests, the king had lavished favours upon him; but at the same time to keep him always under his own eye, he had made him steward of the household. When at last lord Stanley urged his former services to obtain permission to visit his estates, Richard consented with reluctance,

"thas slept, troubled with fearful dreams, suddenly sometimes started up, leapt out of bed, and run about the chamber; so was his restless heart continually tossed and tumbled with the tedious impression and stormy remembrance of this abominable deed." More, 69.

but retained at court the lord Strange as an hostage for the fidelity of his father*.

At length the king was informed by his emissaries that the earl of Richmond with the permission of Charles had raised an army of three thousand adventurers, most of them Normans; and that a fleet was lying in the mouth of the Seine to transport them to England. He ^{June} affected to receive the intelligence with joy; and immediately, to prepare the public for the event, published a long and artful proclamation, which stated that "the king's rebels and traitors, disabled and attainted by authority of the high court of parliament, of whom many were known for open murderers, adulterers, and extortioners, had forsaken their natural country; and put themselves at first under the obedience of the duke of Bretagne, to whom they had made promises so unnatural and abominable that they had been refused by that prince—that they had next betaken themselves to the king's ancient enemy, Charles, calling himself king of France, and chosen for their captain one Henry Tudor, descended of bastard blood both by the father's and the mother's side, and who therefore could never have any claim to the crown of England but by conquest—that the said Henry Tudor, in order that he might achieve his false intent by the aid of the king's ancient enemy of France, had covenanted with him to give up in perpetuity all the right, which the king of England had to the crown of France, to Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Guienne, Calais, and the marches, and to dis sever the arms of France from the arms of England for ever—that in more proof of his said purpose of conquest, the said Henry Tudor had given away archbishoprics, bishoprics, and other dignities spiritual, and the duchies, earldoms, baronies, and other inheritances of knights, esquires, and gentlemen, within the realm—that he intended to change and subvert the " laws of the same, and to do the most cruel murders, slaughters, robberies, and disherisons, that were ever seen in any christian realm--wherefore, the king willed that all his subjects, like good and true Englishmen, should endower themselves with all their power for the defence of them, their wives, children, goods, and hereditaments, and as he, like a diligent and courageous prince, would put his most royal person to all labour and pain necessary in that behalf, to the comfort and surety of his faithful subjects, so he commanded all his said subjects to be ready in their most defensible array to do his highness service of war, when they by open proclamation or otherwise should be commanded so to do, for the resistance of the king's said rebels, traitors and enemies *."

- Having issued instructions to his friends in the maritime counties, and established posts of cavalry on the high roads for the more speedy transmission of intelligence, Richard sent for the great seal, and fixed his headquarters at Nottingham. There he was nearer to his partisans in the north, on whose fidelity he chiefly relied; and thence, as from the centre, he could watch the extremities, of the kingdom. On the first of August his competitor sailed from Harfleur: on the seventh he landed at Milford haven, and directed his march through the northern districts of Wales, a tract of country in the interests of the Stanleys. He met with little to oppose or to encourage him: if the Welsh chieftains did not impede his progress, few joined his standard; and when he took possession of Shrewsbury his army did not exceed four thousand men. A week elapsed before Richard heard of his landing; but orders were instantly despatched for all his subjects to meet him at Leicester,

* Fenn, ii. 319—326. I have abridged the proclamation, but have, as much as possible, retained the very words, that the reader may notice how near the language approaches to that of the present day. with the most alarming menaces against the defaulters. The duke of Norfolk obeyed with the men of the eastern counties, the earl of Northumberland with the northern levies, the lord Lovet from Hampshire, and Brakenbury from London; but the man whom he most feared, the lord Stanley, replied that he was confined to his bed by the sweating sickness. This feint could not deceive the king; and lord Strange, fearing for his life, made an attempt to escape. He was discovered, taken, and induced to confess, that he himself, his uncle sir William Stanley, chamberlain of North Wales, and sir John Savage, had engaged to join the invaders: but he protested that his father was ignorant of their intention, and already on his way to join the royal standard. He was permitted to write to lord Stanley, and to inform him that he must accelerate his march, if he wished to save the life of his son*.

At Leicester the king found himself at the head of a numerous and well-appointed army, which, had it been Aug attached to its leader, might have trampled under foot 20. the contemptible force that followed the banner of his competitor. But Henry, assured by the promises of his secret adherents, continued to press forward, as if he were determined to rush into the very jaws of destruction. He crossed the Severn at Shrewsbury: at Newport he was joined by the tenantry of the Talbots: at Stafford he had a private conference with sir William Stanley; and consented, in order to save, if it were possible, the life of lord Strange, that the Stanleys should continue to wear the appearance of hostility, and constantly retire before him, as he advanced. On the twenty-first of August Richard rode from Leicester with the crown on his head, and encamped about two miles Aug. 21. from the town of Bosworth. The same night Henry proceeded from Tamworth to Atherston, where he joined the Stanleys, and was encouraged by the repeated arri-

In the morning both armies (that of Richard was double in number) advanced to Redmore; and the vanguards, commanded by the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Oxford, engaged. Richard was dismayed to see the Stanleys opposed to him, the earl of Northumberland remaining inactive at his post, and his men wavering and on the point of flying, or going over to his competitor. Chancing to espy Henry, he determined to win the day, or perish in the attempt. Spurring his horse and exclaiming, "Treason, treason *," he slew with his own hand sir William Brandon, the bearer of the hostile standard, struck to the ground sir John Cheney, and made a desperate blow at his rival, when he was overpowered by numbers, thrown from his horse and immediately slain. Lord Stanley, taking up the crown, placed it on the head of Henry, and the conqueror was instantly greeted with the shouts of "Long live king Henry." In the battle and pursuit the duke of Norfolk, the lord Ferrers, some knights, and about three thousand others were killed. The victors lost but few: and to add to their joy, lord Strange, whom Richard had ordered to be beheaded at the beginning of the battle, escaped in the confusion, and rejoined his father. The body of the late king was stript, laid across a horse behind a pursuivant at arms, and conducted to Leicester, where, after it had been exposed for two days, it was buried with little ceremony in the church of the Grey friars †. Henry entered the town with the same royal state with which Richard had marched out on the preceding day. He was careful, however, not to stain his triumph with blood. Of all his prisoners three only suffered death, the notorious Catesby, and two persons of the name of Brecher, who probably had merited that distinction by their crimes ‡.

Of the character of Richard it is unnecessary to say much. If he was guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, he was little better than a monster in human shape. Writers have indeed existed in modern times who have attempted to prove his innocence; but their arguments are rather ingenious ~~and~~ ^{and} ~~convincing~~ ^{unconvincing}, and dwindle into groundless conjectures when confronted with the evidence which may be arrayed against them*.

THE long quarrel between the two houses of York and Lancaster had deluged England with blood: by a fortunate concurrence of circumstances it was given to Henry of Richmond, an exile and an adventurer, without means and without title, to unite the interests of the "two roses," and to bequeath to posterity the benefit of an undisputed succession. From the field of Bosworth he proceeded to Leicester. Victory had placed the crown on his temples; and the absence of a rival secured to him the present possession of the sovereignty. But a perplexing question occurred: on what title was he to ground his claim? On that of hereditary descent? The right of hereditary descent, even supposing it to be in the family of Lancaster, and not of York, could not be propagated through an illegitimate branch, which to prevent dispute, had been originally cut off from the succession by act of parliament. Should he then depend on his stipulated marriage with the princess Elizabeth? But his pride disdained to owe the sceptre to a wife, the representative of a rival and hated family. That would be to justify the dethronement of Henry VI., to acknowledge himself a king only by courtesy, and to exclude his issue by any succeeding marriage from all claim to the throne. There remained the right of conquest: but, though he might appeal to his late victory as an argument that Heaven approved of his pretensions*, he dared not mention the name of conquest, or he would have united his friends with his foes in a common league against him†. The question became the subject of long and anxious deliberation; and it was at last resolved to follow a line of proceeding, which, while it settled the crown on the king and his heirs in general, should not bring either his right, or that of the princess, into discussion‡.

The reader has seen that Richard before his fall had named his nephew, John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, to be his successor. Him and his pretensions Henry treated with contempt; but there was another prince, Edward Plantagenet, son of the late duke of Clarence, whom he viewed with peculiar jealousy. After the execution of Clarence, Edward IV. had sent for the child to court, and had created him earl of Warwick, the title borne by his grandfather. Even Richard, when his own son was dead, had at first assigned to him the

* It was the common persuasion at the time that, as in private duels, so in battles, the event showed the right of the victorious party. Henry alluded to it in parliament. Rot. Parl. vi. 268. And the same doctrine had been openly maintained by Edward IV. honours of the heir-apparent: but afterwards, fearing that he might become a dangerous competitor, had confined him in the castle of Sheriff Hutton in Yorkshire. The first act of the new king at Leicester was to transfer the young prince, who had only reached his fifteenth year, from his prison in the north to a place of greater security, the Tower. The public commiserated the lot of the innocent victim, who thus to satisfy the ambition of others, was condemned to perpetual imprisonment from his childhood; and the spot chosen for his confinement, a spot so lately stained with the blood of princes, was considered as an omen of his subsequent destiny. The princess Elizabeth had been his fellow captive at Sheriff-Hutton. Richard had sent her there as soon as he heard of the invasion; Henry ordered her to be conducted by several noblemen to the house of her mother in London*.

The fall of the usurper excited little regret. No man could pity his death, who had pitied the fate of his unoffending nephews. When the conqueror entered the capital, he was received with unequivocal demonstrations of joy. The mayor and principal citizens met him at Hornsey park, and were permitted to kiss his hand. As he passed through the streets in a close carriage, the crowd obstructed his way, that they might behold and greet the deliverer of his country†. Before him were borne the ensigns of his triumph, the three standards which had led his small army to victory, and these he devoutly offered on the high altar of St. Paul's‡. But his coronation was delayed, and the joy of the public was damped, by the sudden spread of a disease, which acquired from its predominant symptoms the appellation of the sweating sickness. It generally extinguished life within the course of twenty-four hours; and some idea may be formed of its ravages, when it is known that within eight days it proved fatal to two successive lord mayors, and six of the aldermen of London. At the end of a month, whether it were owing to the greater experience of the physicians, or the coldness of the season, its violence began to abate*, and the new king Oct. received the rite of coronation from the hands of the 30. cardinal archbishop of Canterbury. On that occasion twelve knights bannerets were created, and the king's uncle, the earl of Pembroke, was raised to the dignity of duke of Bedford, the lord Stanley to that of earl of Derby, and sir Edward Courtenay to that of earl of Devon†. At the same time he appointed a body of select archers, amounting to fifty men, to attend on him, under the appellation of yeomen of the guard. The institution excited surprise: but Henry justified it on the ground that by foreign princes a guard was considered a necessary appendage to the regal dignity‡.

Soon after the coronation, the king met his parliament; and when the commons presented to him their speaker, was Nov. careful to inform them, that "he had come to the throne 7. "by just title of inheritance, and by the sure judgment of "God, who had given him the victory over his enemy in the "field;" but, lest they should be alarmed by the last words, he added that every man should continue "to enjoy his "rights and hereditaments, with the exception of such persons as in the present parliament should be punished for "their offences against his royal majesty §." It bears proof of having been written but a day or two before that ceremony took place, and yet very strangely mixes up with it directions for the coronation of the queen, as well as the king. It appears to me that the writer copied some more ancient ceremonial, probably that of the coronation of Richard III. and his consort. He could not have supposed that Elizabeth of York would be crowned with Henry before she was even married to him.

mons returned to their own house, an unexpected difficulty arose. A large proportion of the members had been outlawed by the last monarch. Could they sit there in quality of lawgivers? Even the king, who had summoned them together, had been attainted. Was that attainder to continue unrepealed? Henry was displeased with the boldness of these questions: but, dissembling his resentment, he consulted the judges, who replied that as far as regarded the king himself, the crown had cleared away all legal corruption of blood; but that the members attainted by course of law must forbear to sit till their attainder had been reversed by equal authority. The advice was followed: all who had been disinherited by Richard were by one act restored to their former rights; and separate bills were passed in favour of the king's mother, the dukes of Bedford, Buckingham, and Somerset, the marquess of Dorset, the earl of Oxford, the lords Beaumont, Wells, Clifford, Hungerford, Roos, and several others. The whole number of those who profited by this measure amounted to one hundred and seven*. The transactions which followed were important and interesting. 1°. In the settlement of the crown by legislative enactment, Henry proceeded with cautious and measured steps. Jealous as he was of the pretended right of the house of Lancaster, he was equally sensible that the claim of the princess Elizabeth would prove the firmest support of his throne. Hence he watched all the proceedings with the most scrupulous solicitude. To weaken her claim would be to undermine his own interest; to confirm it would encourage a suspicion that he was conscious of a defect in his own title. He therefore refused both to revive the act of Henry IV., which established the succession in the line of John of Ghent, and to repeal that of Edward IV., which established it in the line of Lionel duke of Clarence. In his own favour he commanded that all records, containing any mention of his attainder, should be cancelled and taken off the

Out of respect for her who was to be queen, neither the title nor the body of the act was read in either house. By advice of the judges it was merely designated by the first words ; the original was then ordered to be burnt ; and all persons possessed of copies were commanded to deliver them to the chancellor before Easter, under the penalty of fine and imprisonment ‡. In the act of settlement itself no mention was made of Elizabeth or her heirs ; even Henry's own claim, which he so ostentatiously brought forward in his speech to the commons, " of his just right of inheritance, and the sure judgment of God," was studiously omitted ; and it was merely enacted, that " the inheritance of the crown should be, rest, remain, and abide in the most royal person of the then sovereign lord, king Henry VII., and the heirs of his body lawfully coming, perpetually with the grace of God so to

But this cautious policy, and in particular this silence with respect to the princess, seems to have alarmed not only the partisans of the house of York, but even Henry's own friends, who had trusted that under the union of the red and white roses domestic peace would succeed to war and dissension. When the commons presented to the king the usual grant of tonnage and poundage for life, they coupled with it a petition, that he would be pleased to "take to wife and consort the princess Elizabeth, which

The expression was noticed: how, it was asked, could the late monarch and his supporters have offended the majesty of the earl of Richmond, at a time when he had never publicly advanced any claim to the throne? The case differed from the precedents of the past reigns. If Henry VI. and his friends had been pronounced traitors by Edward, and Edward and his adherents by Henry, on each occasion the supposed offence had been committed against a king, whose claim to the crown had been previously admitted by parliament§. But the treasury was exhausted; Henry wanted the means to defray his expenses, and to reward his followers; and in defiance of the murmurs of the people, Richard III., the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surrey, the lords Lovell, Zouch, and Ferrers, with several knights and gentlemen, amounting in all to thirty individuals, were included in an act of attainder*. 4°. The act of resumption which followed was less invidious, and equally politic. Treading in the footsteps of former monarchs, the king revoked all grants made by the crown since the 34th of Henry VI., and as the grantees were chiefly the partisans of the house of York, they were all placed at the mercy of the king, who, according to his judgment or caprice, had it in his power to take from them, or to confirm to them, the possession of their property†. 5°. Before he dissolved the parliament, he granted a general pardon to the adherents of Richard: but that he might monopolise the whole merit of the measure, he would not allow it to originate at the intercession, or to be issued ^{A. It ^{Jan} was believed that the delay arose from a desire to prevent her name from being inserted in the act of settlement. When that point had been obtained, he hastened to gratify the wishes of his people and parliament. If the ambition of the princess was flattered by this union, we are told (on what authority I know not) that she had little reason to congratulate herself on the score of domestic happiness; that Henry treated her with harshness and with neglect; and that in his estimation neither the beauty of her person, nor the sweetness of her disposition, could atone for the deadly crime of being a descendant of the house of York||.

* Rot. Parl. vi. 275—278. In the act Richard is accused of “unnatural, mischevous, and grete perjuries, treasons, homicides, and murders in shedding of infants blood.” Is not this an allusion to the death of his nephews? I know of no other infants, whom he is said to have murdered.

§ Cont. Croyl 581. André tells us that Edward IV. had before offered Elizabeth to Henry during his exile in Bretagne, but that it was considered as an artifice to entice him into England. Domit. A. xviii.

|| This is asserted by all our historians. The reader will meet hereafter with some reasons to induce a belief, that the statement, if it be true, must at least be confined to the first years of the king's reign.

As the king and queen were relatives, a dispensation had been granted previously to the marriage by the bishop of Imola, the legate of Innocent VIII. But Henry applied for another to the pontiff himself, avowedly for the purpose of removing every doubt respecting the validity of the marriage, but in reality that by introducing into it the meaning which he affixed to the act of settlement, that meaning might have the sanction of the papal authority. Innocent in his rescript

Mar. 27. informs us that, according to the representation made to him in the name of the king, the crown of England belonged to Henry by right of war, by notorious and indisputable hereditary succession, by the wish and election of all the prelates, nobles, and commons of the realm, and by the act of the three estates in parliament assembled: but that nevertheless, to put an end to the bloody wars caused by the rival claims of the house of York, and at the urgent request of the three estates, the king had consented to marry the princess Elizabeth, the eldest daughter and true heir of Edward IV. of immortal memory*. The pontiff, therefore, at the prayer of the king, and to preserve the tranquillity of the realm, confirms the dispensation which has already been granted, and the act of settlement passed by the parliament; declares the meaning of that act to be, that if the queen should die without issue before the king, or if her issue should not survive their father, the crown should in that case devolve to Henry's other children, if he should have any other by a subsequent marriage; and concludes by excommunicating all those, who may hereafter attempt to disturb him or his posterity in the possession of their rights†. The existence of this extraordinary instrument betrays the king's uneasiness with respect to the insufficiency of his own claim.

After his marriage and the dissolution of the parliament, the new monarch, in imitation of his predecessors, resolved to signalise the commencement of his reign by a progress through the kingdom. The natives of the northern counties had been much devoted to Richard: Henry hoped by spending the summer among them to attach them to his own interests. He was keeping the festival of Easter April at Lincoln, when he heard that lord Lovell, formerly chamberlain to Richard, with Humphrey and Thomas Stafford, had suddenly left the sanctuary of Colchester; but whither they were fled, or what might be their object, remained a profound secret. Despising the information, he left Lincoln for Nottingham, with a numerous and splendid Apr. retinue: from Nottingham, where he received an embassy from the king of Scots, he continued his journey; but was stopped at Pontefract by the intelligence that 17 lord Lovell had passed him on the road, had raised a force in the neighbourhood of Rippon and Middleham, and was preparing to surprise him at his entry into York. But Henry's court was now attended by most of the southern and northern nobility; and their followers formed a pretty numerous army. The duke of Bedford led the royalists: by his order an offer of pardon was made to all who should return to their duty; and the insurgent force immediately dispersed. A few were taken and executed by the earl of Northumberland: Lovell himself escaped to his friend sir Thomas Broughton in Lancashire, and thence to the court of Margaret dowager duchess of Burgundy*. At the same time the Staffords had prepared to take possession of the city of Worcester: but the dispersion of the Yorkshire insurgents proved the hopelessness of the attempt; and the two brothers

* Hall, 3, Bacon, 11, and others tell us that Lovell's attempt happened after Henry's arrival at York, and was put down by the duke of Bedford. I have followed the journal of one of the heralds who accompanied the court. Lel. Coll. iv. 186.

fled for sanctuary to the church of Colnham, an obscure village near Abingdon. Humphrey Stafford was taken thence by force; was condemned by the judges in virtue of the act of attainder formerly passed against him, and suffered at Tyburn the death of a traitor. It is said that the younger brother obtained a pardon, on the plea that he had acted under the control of the elder*.

He spent three weeks in that city, dispensing favours, conferring honours, and redressing grievances: a conduct, the policy of which was proved by the loyalty of the country during the invasion of the following year‡.
- May 20. Thence he returned through Worcester, Hereford, Gloucester, and Bristol, to London, to receive a numerous and splendid embassy sent by James king of Scotland.
- June 5. During his progress through each county, he was accompanied by the sheriffs, and the resident nobility and gentry; on all Sundays and festivals he attended divine service in public; and on such occasions he heard a sermon from one of the bishops, who was ordered to read and explain to the audience the papal bull confirmatory of the king's marriage and title. He left the citizens of Worcester with evident marks of displeasure: but by his condescension attached to himself those of

* The prisoner had been brought to Worcester to suffer there (May 20), but the abbot of Abingdon arrived on the same day, and required that he should be replaced in the sanctuary. This saved his life for the time. He was sent to the Tower, and the judges were consulted by the king, whether Colnham had the privilege of a sanctuary. They replied it was hard, and contrary to order that they should give their opinions beforehand on a matter on which they would have to decide judicially. Henry assented with reluctance: the point was argued before all the judges; and the claim of sanctuary was rejected. Year-book, Term Pas. 1 Henry VII. 15. Term Trin. 1.

Bristol, whom he consulted on the causes of the decay of their trade, and at the same time encouraged by his promise to restore their city to its former prosperity*.

To a prince in Henry's situation it was of the highest importance to live on terms of amity with his neighbours. Among these the most to be feared was James king of Scotland, from his proximity, from the ancient enmity between the two nations, and from that attachment to the house of York, which still lurked among the inhabitants of the northern counties. Fortunately James had long cherished a strong partiality for the English; a partiality so marked, that it formed the principal of the charges alleged against him by the rebels, who afterwards deprived him of life. He had sent a deputation to assist at the coronation of Henry; other envoys had met the king at Nottingham; and now a most honourable embassy awaited his arrival in London. The negotiation lasted almost a month. As the former truce between the two crowns was supposed to have expired at the death of Richard, both kings readily consented to its renewal. But the turbulence and discontent of the Scottish nobility compelled James to limit July its duration to three years; and Henry could only obtain³. a promise that it should be continued till the death of one of the two monarchs, and that a matrimonial alliance should be contracted between the royal families of England and Scotland†.

It might have been expected that the king would have taken his queen with him during his progress, to gratify the partisans of the house of York: it was supposed that he refused through his jealousy of her influence, and his unwillingness to seem indebted to her for his crown. She kept her court at Winchester with her mother and sisters, and the countess of Richmond, her mother-in-law. As she advanced in her pregnancy, the king removed from London to hunt in the new

 given him little uneasiness: but the birth of his son, which threatened to perpetuate the crown in his family, urged them to one of the most extraordinary attempts recorded in history. First a report was spread that the young earl of Warwick had perished in the Tower.
 soon afterwards one Richard Simons, a priest of Oxford, entirely unknown in Ireland, landed at Dublin with a boy about fifteen years of age, presented his ward to the lord deputy of Ireland, by the name of Edward Plantagenet, the very earl so lately reported to have been murdered, and implored the protection of that nobleman for a young and innocent prince, who, by escaping from the Tower, had avoided a fate similar to that of his unfortunate cousins, the sons of Edward IV. The boy—he was the son of Thomas Simnel, a joiner at Oxford†— had been well instructed in the part which he had to perform. His person was handsome: his address had something in it which seemed to bespeak nobility of descent; and he could relate with apparent accuracy his adventures at Sheriff-Hutton, in the Tower, and

The ceremony of the christening of Arthur is afterwards described (204—207). I observe that the queen dowager was godmother, and that her daughter Cecily, attended by Anne, another of her daughters, carried the child; a proof that the queen's family was at this period in high favour with the king.

during his escape. But why he should be seduced to personate a prince who was still living, and who might any day be confronted with him, is a mystery difficult to unravel. Of the reasons which have been assigned, the least improbable is that, which supposes that the framers of the plot designed, if it succeeded, to place the real Warwick on the throne; but that, sensible how much they should endanger his life, if they were to proclaim him while he was in the Tower, they set up a counterfeit Warwick, and by this contrivance made it the interest of Henry to preserve the true one.

Among the English settlers in Ireland the partisans of the house of York had maintained a decided ascendancy ever since the administration of duke Richard in the reign of Henry VI. The Butlers alone had dared to unsheath the sword in favour of the Lancastrians; and they had paid by attainders and executions the penalty of their attachment to the interests of the red rose. At the time of the battle of Bosworth the reins of administration were held by the chief of the Yorkists, the earl of Kildare; nor did Henry venture, at the commencement of his reign, to irritate a powerful faction by removing either the lord deputy, or the members of the council. But his jealousy was soon awakened by the reports of his spies: Kildare received a mandate to attend the English court; and his disobedience was excused by a petition from the spiritual and temporal peers, stating in forcible terms the necessity of his presence in Ireland. His conduct on the arrival of Simons was of a nature to confirm Henry's suspicions. He showed no distrust of the two adventurers; he inquired not how the earl came to be committed to the charge of an unknown priest, only twenty-seven years old; he evinced no anxiety to ascertain whether the real Warwick were still in the Tower or not; he allowed the lord Thomas Fitz-Gerald, the chancellor, to introduce the boy under his assumed name to the nobility of Ireland and the citizens of Dublin, and to promise him protection against his enemies, and those of his family. The Butlers, the bishops of Cashel, Tuam, Clogher, and Ossory, and the citizens of Waterford, remained steady in their allegiance: the rest of the population, relying on the acquiescence or authority of Kildare, admitted the title of the new Plantagenet without doubt or investigation; and the adventurer was proclaimed by the style of Edward VI., king of England and France, and lord of Ireland*. Most assuredly the deputy had been already admitted into the secret.

When the intelligence reached Henry he was alarmed, not so much at what had happened, as from his ignorance of what might follow. 1. He assembled a great council of peers and prelates, and by their advice consented to do what he ought to have done long before†. The pardon which he had issued in favour of his opponents had been not only clogged with restrictions, but frequently violated. He now published a pardon which was full, without exceptions, and extended to every species of treason. 2. He conducted the real earl of Warwick from the Tower to St. Paul's, that he might be publicly recognised by the citizens; and took him with him to the palace of Shene, where the young prince conversed daily with the noblemen and others who visited the court‡. This prudent measure satisfied the people of England. They laughed at the impostor in Ireland, while the Irish maintained that theirs was the real, and that the boy at Shene was the pretended Plantagenet. 3. But the next measure created surprise. The reader has witnessed the honourable manner in which the queen dowager lived at court. Suddenly, if we may believe several writers, she was arrested, despoiled of her goods, and committed to the custody of the monks of Bermondsey. The reason assigned for this harsh treatment was, that after having, in the last reign, promised her daughter to Henry, she had delivered her into the hands of the usurper. But the pretext was too improbable to obtain credit. It was suspected that she had been concerned in the present plot*. Yet where could be her inducement? If Henry were dethroned, her daughter must share the fate of her husband. If the real or pretended Warwick should obtain the crown, all her children would of course be disinherited. At every step of this affair we meet with new mysteries. It will be recollected that the earl of Lincoln had been treated by Richard as heir apparent. Though he viewed the new king as an usurper, he had carefully suppressed his feelings, and had been summoned to the last council, as one in whom Henry placed confidence. Yet the moment it was dissolved he repaired to the court of his aunt, the duchess of Burgundy, consulted with her and lord Lovell, and receiving an aid of two thousand veterans under Martin Swartz, an experienced officer, sailed to Ireland, and landed at Dublin. His arrival gave A. D. 1487. new importance to the cause of the counterfeit Warwick. Mar. 19. Though Lincoln had frequently conversed with the real prince at Shene †, he advised that the impostor should be crowned: the ceremony of his coronation was performed by the bishop of Meath, with a diadem taken May 24. from a statue of the virgin Mary; and the new king was carried, after the Irish manner, from the church to the castle on the shoulders of an English chieftain of the name of Darcy. Writs were even issued in his name; a parliament was convoked; and legal penalties were enacted against his principal opponents, Thomas

* See Polydore, 504. Bacon, 16, 17. It is, indeed, possible that in a moment of alarm and uncertainty Henry may have confined the widow of Edward IV., as a measure of precaution. But I suspect the whole story has no other foundation than the fact that for the three or four last years of her life Elizabeth chose to live in retirement at Bermondsey, paying occasional visits only to her daughter at Windsor. But of late this story has not only been assumed as true, but has been explained on the supposition that she was confined to prevent her from revealing to the insurgents the dangerous secret that her son Richard was yet alive (Laing, 433), a supposition, however, which is entirely overturned by a fact to be mentioned in the course of a few pages.

and William Butler, and the citizens of Waterford*. But what could be Lincoln's object in contributing to this farce! Even the real earl of Warwick could not be heir to the crown as long as any of the posterity of Edward IV. were alive. If it be said that they had been declared illegitimate, so had Clarence the father of Warwick been attainted. In that case Lincoln himself had a better claim than the prince in whose right he pretended to draw the sword. When Henry first heard of the departure of Lincoln, he made a progress through the counties of Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk, in which the earl possessed considerable interest; and thence proceeded through Northampton and Coventry to his castle of Kenilworth, which he had appointed for the residence of his queen, and his mother. There intelligence was received that Lincoln with his German auxiliaries, and a body of Irish associates, had landed at the pile of Foudray in the southern extremity of Furness; had remained in his camp at Swartmore, near Ulverstone, till he had been joined by the tenantry of sir Thomas Broughton; and was actually on his march through the county of York. The king soon found himself surrounded by his friends with their retainers, and orders were published by his authority for "the goode rule of his hooste." To steal, rob, or ravish; to take provisions without paying the price affixed by the clerk of the market; and to arrest or imprison any man on the pretext of delinquency but without special orders, were made crimes punishable with death. To take other lodgings than those assigned by the proper officers, to cause any quarrel or affray, or to prevent persons from bringing provisions to the army, subjected the offenders to the lesser punishment of imprisonment. Every man was ordered under the same penalty to saddle his horse at the first blast of the trumpet, to bridle it at the second, and at the third to be mounted and ready to march. Vagabonds, who had no master, and common women, were threatened with the stocks and imprisonment*.

The two armies, as if by mutual compact, hastened towards Newark. It was in vain that the earl, as he advanced, tempted the loyalty of the inhabitants by proclaiming Edward VI. the head of the house of York. The real partisans of that family were restrained by their fears or their incredulity; and the few, who joined the standard of the adventurer, were outlaws or men of desperate fortunes. Disappointed but undismayed, Lincoln resolved to stake his life on the event of a battle; and precipitated his march, that he might find the king unprepared. The royalists had moved from June Kenilworth by Coventry, Leicester, and Nottingham; 8. their numbers daily increased: but their quarters were ill chosen; and night after night they were thrown into confusion by alarms which furnished opportunities of desertion to the timid and disaffected. But, what will excite the surprise of the reader, the whole army lost its way between Nottingham and Newark. Five guides were at length procured from the village of Ratcliffe, and soon afterwards the vanguard, under the earl of Oxford, was attacked at Stoke by the insurgents, amounting to eight thousand men. The action was short but sanguinary. The Germans fought and perished with the resolution of veterans; the adventurers from Ireland displayed their characteristic bravery, but with their darts and skeans (for the English settlers had adopted the arms of the natives) they were no match for the heavy cavalry; and though a portion only of the royalists was engaged, the victory was won with the slaughter of one half of their opponents. Of the leaders of the insurgents, the earl of Lincoln, the lords Thomas and Maurice Fitz-Gerald, sir Thomas Broughton, and

Martin Swartz, remained on the field of battle; lord Lovell was seen to escape from his pursuers; but whether he perished in crossing the Trent, or contrived to secrete himself from the notice of his friends and foes, is uncertain. He was never seen or heard of after that day*. Simons and his pupil surrendered to Robert Bellingham, one of the king's esquires. The priest was made to confess the imposture before the convocation, and then thrown into a prison, in which he perished. But the pretended Edward VI. obtained his pardon, resumed his real name of Lambert Simnel, was made a scullion in the royal kitchen, and afterwards, in reward of his good conduct, was raised to the more honourable office of falconer†.

From this insurrection the king learned an important lesson, that it was not his interest to wound the feelings of those, whose principles had attached them to the house of York. His behaviour to the queen had created great discontent. Why, it was asked, was she not crowned? Why was she, the rightful heir to the crown, refused the usual honours of royalty? Other kings had been eager to crown their consorts; but Elizabeth had now been married a year and a half; she had borne the king a son to succeed to the throne; and yet she was kept in obscurity, as if she were unworthy of her station. Henry resolved to silence these mur-

* On account of his disappearance several writers have supposed that he perished in the battle. But the journal of the herald who was present evidently proves that he escaped. After mentioning the names of the slain, he adds, "and the viscount lorde Lovell was put to flight." Lel. Coll. 214. Towards the close of the seventeenth century, at his seat at Minster Lovell in Oxfordshire, was accidentally discovered a chamber under the ground, in which was the skeleton of a man seated in a chair, with his head reclined on a table. Hence it is supposed that the fugitive had found an asylum in this subterraneous chamber, where he was perhaps starved to death through neglect. There is also a tradition that sir Thomas Broughton escaped from the field, and lived till his death in concealment among his tenants at Witherslack in the county of Westmoreland. West's Furness, 210.

murs, and from Warwick issued the requisite orders for her coronation. The ceremony was performed during Nov. the session of parliament: an ample provision was made ^{25.} for her maintenance; and from that period Elizabeth was brought forward on all occasions of parade, and seemed to enjoy the same consideration as former queens*.

The first care of the parliament was to supply the wants of the conqueror by a grant of money, and a bill of attainder, which included almost every man of property engaged in the late insurrection †. Next the king required their aid to put down the dangerous and unlawful practice of "maintenance." The reader will recollect that by "maintenance" was understood an association of individuals under a chief, whose livery they wore, and to whom they bound themselves by oaths and promises, for the purpose of maintaining by force the private quarrels of the chief and the members. Hence the course of justice was obstructed, jurors were intimidated, and offenders escaped with impunity. Hence also (and this it was that chiefly provoked the hostility of the king) powerful noblemen were furnished with the means of raising forces at a short warning to oppose the reigning prince, or to assist a new claimant. In the

* On the Friday before the coronation fourteen gentlemen were created knights of the Bath. On the Saturday the queen went in procession from the Tower to Westminster. She was dressed in white cloth of gold of damask, with a mantle of the same furred with ermine. "Her faire yelow hair hung downe pleyne byhynd her bak, with a calle of pipes over it." On her head was a circle of gold ornamented with precious stones. In this dress she was borne through the city reclining in a litter, with a canopy of cloth of gold carried over her by four knights of the body. Several carriages, and four baronesses on grey palfreys followed. On the Sunday she was crowned, and afterwards dined in the hall. "The lady Catharine Grey and mistress Ditton went under the table, and sate at her feet, while the countesses of Oxford and Rivers knelt on each side, and at certeyne tymys helde a korchief byfor her grace." The king viewed both the coronation and the dinner from behind a lattice. Lel. Coll. iv. 216—233.

† Rot. Parl. vi. 386, 400. I have said, "almost every man of property," for by mistake or design lord Lovell was omitted. But the omission was discovered eight years afterwards, and a new bill of attainder was passed to include him (Rot. Parl. vi. 502). The number, however, of the insurgents had then dwindled from eight to five thousand, a proof that we are not to trust to acts of attainder for more than the substance of the offence.

preceding parliament an oath had been required from the lords, and was ordered to be taken by the commons in each county, that they would not keep in their service men openly cursed, or murderers, or felons, or outlaws; that they would not retain persons by indentures, or give liveries contrary to law; and that they would not make riots or maintenances, nor oppose the due execution of the king's writs *. In the present it was enacted that the chancellor, treasurer, and keeper of the privy seal, or two of them with one bishop, one temporal peer, and the chief judges of the king's bench and common pleas, should have authority to call before them persons accused of having offended in any of these points, and to punish the guilty, as if they had been convicted by the ordinary course of justice. It appears from the acts of the council that in cases of breach of the peace committed, or of combinations likely to lead to such breach formed, by persons whose rank and power screened them from the ordinary pursuit of justice, it had been the custom for the king to call such individuals before the council, where contending parties were reconciled, the guilty punished, and the suspected compelled to give security for their good behaviour. This, which might be called the criminal jurisdiction of the council, was transferred to the new court now erected: which, however useful it may have proved at its origin, was gradually converted into an engine of intolerable oppression. Other privy counsellors besides those named in the act, even peers not privy counsellors, were called in to sit as judges; the limits of their jurisdiction, as fixed by statute, were extended till they included libels, misdemeanors, and contempts; and the power of pronouncing

* Ibid. 287. Rym. xii. 280. On that occasion the judges had been consulted, who replied that it was impossible to enforce the execution of the laws, as long as "maintenances" existed. that judgment on delinquents to which they would have been liable if they had been convicted "after the due course of law," grew in practice into a power of punishing at discretion, and with a severity which provoked the curses and hatred of all classes of men. This court was called the court of the star-chamber, from the accidental decorations of the room, in which it usually sate*.

Henry was careful to cultivate the friendship which subsisted between him and the king of Scots. To cement it the more firmly, Fox bishop of Durham had been sent during the summer to Edinburgh; and a mutual agreement had been made, that James, who Nov. had lost his consort, the daughter of the king of Den-28. mark, should marry Elizabeth, the queen dowager of England, and that his two sons should also marry two of her daughters†. Days were even appointed for the

Six of the ring-leaders were attainted of felony by parliament, and an act was passed which made it felony without benefit of clergy for any person under the rank of a lord, if he were entered on the cheque-roll of the household, to conspire the death of the king, of any peer, of any privy counsellor, or of the steward, treasurer, or comptroller of the household. † Rym. xii. 329. This fact deserves particular notice, as it invincibly disproves the hypothesis of those writers, who maintain that Henry knew that one of the sons of Edward IV. was still living, and had confined their mother Elizabeth, that she might not divulge the secret. If this were true, it is incredible that he could have wished to marry Elizabeth to the king of Scots, and her two daughters to two Scottish princes. Such marriages would have placed her in a situation where she might have published the truth without fear, have secured an asylum for her son, and have seconded his claim with all the power of Scotland. Indeed, I give no credit to the account of Henry's enmity to his mother-in-law. That she was high in the king's favour just before the rebellion of Lincoln, appears from his having chosen her to be godmother to his son: that she was equally so after, may be inferred from his wish to marry her the same year to his friend the king of Scots.—Polydore, indeed (p. 571), and Bacon (p. 16), who transcribes Hall (p. 3), tell us that the king, on the rebellion of Lincoln, deprived her of all her lands and estates. If they mean her dower as queen, the only property which she had, their assertion is undoubtedly false. She had been deprived of that by Richard III.: nor was it restored by Henry's parliament, when it repealed so much of the act as deprived her "of the name, estate, and dignity of queen" (Rot. Parl. vi. 288). In lieu of it the king granted her a compensation. See the collection of unpublished acts by Rymer, Hen. VII. tom. I. Nos. 29, 39. Again, meeting of ambassadors to fix the marriage settlements : but the project was interrupted by the rebellion of the Scottish lords, and finally defeated by the death of James, who, after losing the battle of Caglor in June 1488, June was murdered at the mill of Beaton during his flight.

11. Though Henry grieved for the death of his friend, he was anxious to maintain the relations of amity with his successor ; and therefore, as the truce might be said to have terminated at the death of James, he ratified it anew in the following month. Thus was peace continued between the two crowns for the space of eleven years ; an unusual duration, preparative of that harmony, which after centuries of rapine and bloodshed, was at last happily established *.

As soon as the king was relieved from domestic enemies, he was compelled to direct his attention to the continent. By force, or policy, or good fortune, the French monarchs had gradually obtained possession of the other great fiefs of the crown : Bretagne alone retained its own prince, and its ancient constitution. But the duke Francis was advanced in age, and weak both in mind and body. His family consisted of two daughters, the elder of whom named Anne had reached her twelfth year. So rich an heiress attracted a number of suitors, among whom the most distinguished were, Maximilian king of the Romans, the duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood in France, and the lord d'Albret, a powerful chieftain near the foot of the Pyrenees. Each of these might flatter himself with the hope of obtaining with the princess her ample patrimony ; but they had all a dangerous enemy in the king of France, who, though Polydore (ibid.) assures us that she ever afterwards led a miserable life, Carte (p. 827), and Laing (p. 433), that she was kept in the strictest confinement. But this too must be in a great measure, if not entirely, false ; for we accidentally learn from the journal of the herald (Lel. Coll. iv. 249), that when the French ambassadors were introduced to the queen at Westminster in November, 1489, "ther was with hir hir moder quene Elizabeth, "and my lady the kinge's moder ;" and we find her next year receiving an annuity from the king. he was prevented from soliciting the hand of Anne by a previous contract with the daughter of Maximilian, had determined at the death of the duke to take possession of the duchy in virtue of some ancient and unintelligible claim, which had lain dormant for centuries.

Charles VIII. had ascended the throne in 1483, at the age of fourteen, an age at which the law presumed that the heir to the sceptre must be possessed of sufficient capacity and experience to govern the kingdom. But his father Louis XI. had thought otherwise; and in obedience to the instructions of that monarch, the states placed the young king under the tutelage of his elder sister, Anne of France, who had married Pierre de Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu. The duke of Orleans, though he had not reached his twenty-fourth year, was offended with the choice: he raised forces against the regent, and was compelled to seek the protection of the duke of Bretagne. It so chanced that at the same time several Breton nobles, who had incurred the resentment of Francis by the murder of his favourite minister Pierre de Landois, had fled to the court of Charles. The regency declared war, for the apparent purpose of compelling the duke to pardon the exiles, and give up the French prince, but with the real view of preventing the marriage of Anne, and of annexing Bretagne to the crown. Both parties applied to Henry. The king of France deprecated his interference: the duke solicited immediate assistance. Charles, to lull his jealousy, represented the war as an unimportant quarrel between himself and the protector of a rebellious vassal; Francis endeavoured to awaken his fears, by describing the accession of power which France would derive from the conquest of the duchy. Each appealed to his gratitude. The former reminded him of the French auxiliaries who fought under his banner at the battle of Bosworth; the latter of the protection which he had experienced during his long exile in Bretagne. Henry was perplexed; and unwilling to offend either, he offered himself as a mediator between both. With this view his almoner Urswick was employed month after month in useless journeys between the courts of Paris, Rennes, and Westminster. Charles, while he professed himself willing to accept the mediation, prosecuted the war with additional vigour. In May he entered Bretagne: Ploermel and Vannes were compelled to open their gates; and in June the duke saw himself besieged in his capital. Maximilian sent to his assistance a body of fifteen hundred men, who, with a reinforcement of Bretons, fought their way through the French lines, and ultimately compelled the enemy to abandon the siege. Charles, however, continued the war; and to be revenged of the king of the Romans, ordered the mareschal de Cordes to aid the citizens of Bruges and Ghent, who had revolted from Maximilian. Francis reiterated his solicitations to Henry; but the king trusting to the chance of events, and the internal resources of Bretagne, always promised and always delayed. It was not that he could plead poverty. His parliament had granted him two fifteenths, and advised him to assist his friend; but avarice prompted him to accept the money, and to neglect the advice. He acquainted the French court with the proceedings of parliament, in the vain hope that Charles might be terrified into forbearance; he refused to English adventurers the royal permission to serve in the army of Francis; and when sir Edward Wydevile with four hundred men privately sailed from the Isle of Wight for Bretagne, he not only disavowed the expedition to the French government, but consented to an armistice which should last for six months*.

It was not, however, long before he saw reason to doubt the policy of such vacillating conduct. In the disastrous battle of St. Aubin, sir Edward Wydevile was slain with all his countrymen and seventeen hundred Bretons, who, to deceive the enemy, had adopted the white coats and red crosses of the English soldiers. The duke of Orleans was made prisoner; St. Aubin, Dinant, and St. Malo surrendered; and Francis signed a ^{Aug.} treaty, by which he consented that Charles should retain all his conquests, and that neither of his daughters should marry without the approbation of the French king. But the sequel was still more perplexing. In a ^{Sept.} few weeks Francis died, and soon afterwards his younger ^{8.} daughter followed him to the grave. The king of France, in virtue of his pretended claim, demanded the whole succession: hostilities recommenced; and before Christmas one half of Bretagne was in the hands of the French. The clamour of the nation now roused Henry from his apathy. On the same day he despatched envoys to the kings of Spain and Portugal, to Maximilian and his son ^{Dec.} the archduke Philip, to Anne of Bretagne, and Charles ^{11.} of France. Of these embassies the four first were chiefly meant for parade; to the orphan princess he made the offer of an English army; to the king of France he proposed a renewal of the truce, but with an additional clause, that each party might include his allies. Sensible that the proposal would be rejected, he insinuated to Charles, that if his people compelled him to aid the Bretons, his army should act entirely on the defensive*.

Henry now summoned a parliament. The nation ^{A.D. 1489} was anxious to rescue a young and unfortunate princess ^{Jan.} from the power of a victorious enemy: but the cold-^{13.} hearted king had determined to enrich himself from the generosity of the one, and the necessities of the other. From his subjects he demanded an aid of one hundred thousand pounds for the maintenance of ten thousand archers during twelve months: but the amount was cut down to seventy-five thousand; and to raise that sum, the lords for themselves, the commons for themselves and their constituents, granted to the king a tenth of the yearly produce of their lands, fees, and pensions, with a tax on personal property of one penny in eight. To

 Feb. Anne he promised an army of six thousand archers to
 10. serve for six months; but on conditions to which her necessities compelled her to subscribe, that she should surrender two fortresses as securities for the repayment of the expense, and should take an oath not to marry without his consent. In the spring sir Robert Willoughby de Brooke landed in Bretagne with the stipulated number of men but as Charles knew that the English were forbidden to undertake offensive operations, he ordered his own forces to abstain from a general engagement. The consequence was that a few skirmishes kept up the appearance of hostilities; and the auxiliaries, as soon as
 Nov. the six months of their service were completed, returned to their own country*.

But, if the war languished in Bretagne, it was distinguished by a most brilliant action in Flanders. The revolted Flemings with the aid of De Cordes had besieged Dixmude; and the lords Daubeney and Morley with two thousand archers and thrice that number of Germans, attacked them in their camp, though it was defended by a strong battery. The archers poured a volley of arrows into the trenches, fell on the ground till the guns had been discharged, rose on their feet, poured in a second volley, and rushed precipitately into the camp. The victory was complete: but it was stained with cruelty. Revenge for the death of "that gentill yong knight the lord Morlay" so transported the victors, that they refused to give quarter, and eight thousand of the enemy are said to have been slain, a carnage almost incredible, if we consider the small number of the combatants in each army†.

† Hall, 18. Bacon, 47: The herald has celebrated in his journal the resolution of an archer, called John Pearson, of Coventry, who, having lost a leg by a cannon shot, continued to discharge his arrows kneeling or sitting. The expedition to Bretagne had, however, been productive of some advantage. It had stopped the progress of the French arms. At the same time the levies of Ferdinand king of Spain had compelled Charles to detach a numerous force to Fontarabia, for the protection of that frontier. In these circumstances the defeat at Dixmude, and the surrender of St. Omer to the king of the Romans, induced the French monarch to listen to proposals for peace; and in a convention with Maximilian, he consented to restore to the princess all the towns which belonged to Francis at the time of his death, and promised that, as soon as the English forces should retire, and she should give security for her allegiance, St. Malo, Fougères, Dinant, and St. Aubin should be sequestered, to remain in the hands of an indifferent person till the claim of Charles to the duchy could be satisfactorily determined.

We may now return to England, where of the sum voted in the last session of parliament only a small part had been raised. The commons of the northern counties had not only refused to pay their proportion, but had even murdered the king's lieutenant, the earl of Northumberland. But the insurrection was quickly suppressed by the earl of Surrey: John à Chambre, one of the ringleaders, suffered at York; and sir John Egremont, the other, escaped to the duchess of Burgundy*. In the next session, the deficiency of the tax, which instead of seventy-five had produced no more than twenty-five thousand pounds, was amply supplied by the grant of a tenth and fifteenth. Henry with great care deposited the money in his coffers. War was not his object. Instead of military preparations he consumed the whole of the present and a great part of the next year in forming and re-forming alliances with the kings of Spain and of the Romans. Never perhaps did three princes profess more, and feel less, affection for each other. For the common advantage of Christendom they agreed to set bounds to the ambition of France: but in reality each sought, by working on the apprehensions of Charles, to promote his individual interest. Maximilian hoped to recover the ancient patrimony of his family on the north of France, and with the duchess to obtain the duchy of Bretagne; Ferdinand expected to procure the restitution of Roussillon, which he had formerly mortgaged for a loan of three hundred thousand crowns; while Henry cared little for the fate of Bretagne, or the interest of his allies, provided he could extort from Anne security for the repayment of his expenses, and from Charles a valuable present in reward of his forbearance*.

The king of the Romans, both by the promptitude with which he had formerly sent succours to Francis, and the attention which he had lately paid to the interests of Anne, had won the esteem of both the father and daughter; and when, during the cessation of hostilities, she signified her consent to his proposal of marriage, she did no more than comply with the wishes of her deceased parent. If Maximilian had improved the golden opportunity to visit Bretagne, he would have secured the object of his ambition; but his Flemish subjects were in rebellion; the journey by land or water would expose him to his enemies; and it was thought that the marriage by proxy would be equally certain, and less dangerous. With this view the prince of Orange, as the representative of the king of the Romans, married the duchess in his name in the month of April; and within a few weeks, the lord d'Albret, one of her suitors, to revenge the disappointment, betrayed to the French the important city of Nantes. War was now renewed; the king of the Romans thinking himself secure, neglected to succour his wife; Henry harassed her with demands of money for the repayment of his former expenses ; and Charles formed the plan, suspected by neither of these powers, of compelling her to break her contract with Maximilian, and to marry himself*.

It was true that at an early age he had been contracted to Margaret of Austria, Maximilian's daughter, who had been educated in France as his consort, and only waited till she reached the age of puberty to ratify the marriage. But this circumstance, which might have deterred other princes, only supplied Charles with a cloak to conceal his real intention. By promises and bribes he bought the counsellors of the duchess : but when the proposal was made to her, she rejected it with disdain. Was not Charles her natural enemy ? Was he not contracted to Margaret ? Was not she herself married to Maximilian ? They replied that she ought to sacrifice a feeling of dislike to the interest of her country ; that the contract between Charles and Margaret was void, because that princess was under age ; and that the marriage between herself and Maximilian had not been consummated, and might therefore be dissolved, because Bretagne was a fief of the French crown, and by law an heiress could not marry without the consent of her lord. These reasons made no impression on the mind of Anne ; but they were supported by a French army, which appeared before the gates of Rennes. She was now told that her obstinacy had been punished. There remained no hope of escape. She must be either the wife or the captive of Charles. Subdued at last by importunity and terror, she consented to a treaty, of which the principal articles were that she should marry the French king ; that the rights of each should be reciprocally communicated to the other ; that the survivor should retain possession of the duchy ; but that, in case she were the survivor, she should, if she remained single, bequeath her dominions to the reigning prince, or, if she chose to marry, marry no one but the actual possessor, or the presumptive heir, of the French crown. She was married to Charles at Langey in Tourraine, and

Dec. 13. crowned in the abbey church of St. Denis*.

The reader may conceive the feelings of Maximilian at this double disappointment. By his own inactivity, and the arts of his enemy, he had lost for himself a wife and a principality, for his daughter a husband and a throne. His rage vented itself in threats and imprecations: but the exhaustion of his treasury, and the factious temper of his people, forbade him to seek revenge by open hostilities. Henry received the intelligence with the coolness of a philosopher; and, instead of irritating his mind by reflecting on what he had lost, sate himself down to calculate the chances of deriving pecuniary advantages from the event. During the last

July 7. year he had repeatedly assumed a warlike attitude: he had ordered troops to be levied, stores to be provided; he had even appointed commissioners to extort money in the different counties under the illegal and vexatious name of "benevolence †." In October he acquainted

Oct. 17. the parliament with his resolution of chastising the perfidy of the French king, (though Charles had not then married the princess,) and obtained from it a grant of two tenths, and two fifteenths ‡. After Christmas he found both houses still more eager for war: an act was passed in favour of those who should accompany the king, enabling them to alienate their estates without treasury, and making it felony for any soldier to leave the army without the permission of his superior officer*.

Still these laws and preparations were but a mask, under which the king sought to conceal his designs from his own subjects as well as the enemy. The former would pay the tenths and fifteenths; the latter might perhaps offer a valuable sum for the purchase of peace. With this view he continually invented reasons for delay. It would be dangerous to leave the kingdom exposed to the inroads of the Scots; four months were employed in negotiating a prolongation of the armistice between the two kingdoms†. Two more were consumed in forming contracts for the levy of different descriptions of force; of men at arms each attended by his custrel and page, of lancers and archers on horseback, and of foot soldiers armed with bows, halberds, and bills‡. These troops were mustered and inspected in June and July; yet week passed after week, and the season for active operations was suffered to elapse before the king put himself at the head of the army. In the beginning of Oct. October he landed at Calais; a fortnight later he sat down before Boulogne, with sixteen hundred men at arms, and twenty-five thousand infantry.

It was now believed that the war had begun; and the people of England flattered themselves with the anticipation of victory and conquest. Henry had other objects in view. As long back as the month of June he had commissioned the lord d'Aubigny, governor of Calais, to negotiate a peace and alliance with Charles; and, if we may judge from appearances, that peace was, in substance at least, already concluded. On the part of France no preparations were made to repel the invaders; and Henry, instead of acting with vigour, first published a letter from his envoy in the court of Maximilian, and then another from his ambassador with Ferdinand, that the army might know how little was to be expected from

Oct. either of those princes. Soon afterwards he received
 27. from D'Aubigny the rough draft of a treaty, which was immediately submitted to the consideration of twenty-four of his principal officers. In their report to the king they advised him to sign it, alleging the lateness of the season, the sickness of the army, the inactivity of his allies, the strength of Boulogne, and the neighbouring fortresses, and the advantageous offers of his antagonist. Henry had asked their opinion merely to exonerate himself from the blame; and two treaties, the one public, the other private, were immediately concluded. By the former, peace, alliance, and confederacy, were established between the two crowns, to last during the lives of both kings, and for one year after the death of the survivor, by the latter Charles bound himself to pay to Henry by half-yearly instalments of twenty-five thousand francs, the aggregate sum of one hundred and forty-nine thousand pounds sterling; one hundred and twenty-four thousand of which should be received in lieu of all claims against Anne of Bretagne, and twenty-five thousand as the arrears of the annuity due to the late king Edward IV. Henry returned to Calais. His favourites, who had received bribes from the French king, applauded the wisdom and good fortune of their master; but the army loudly condemned the dissimulation and avarice of a prince, who, to replenish his own coffers, had not hesitated to disappoint the hopes of the nation, and to lead so many knights and noblemen to ruinous, and at the same time unnecessary expenses*.

It is now time to introduce to the reader one of the most mysterious personages recorded in English history. About the time when Henry declared war against France, a merchant vessel from Lisbon cast anchor in the cove of Cork. Among the passengers was a youth, May 5. whom no person knew, about twenty years of age, of handsome features and courtly deportment. It was soon rumoured that he was Richard duke of York, the second son of Edward IV.: but how his birth was ascertained, or in what manner he accounted for his escape from the Tower, when Edward V. was murdered *, or where he had lived during the last seven years, though questions which must have been asked, are secrets, which have never been explained. To such inquiries, however, he gave answers which satisfied the credulity of his friends; and, as the English settlers were warmly attached to the house of York, O'Water, the late mayor of Cork, easily induced the citizens to declare in his favour. An attempt was even made to secure the assistance of the earl of Kildare, and of his kinsman the earl of Desmond, formerly the great supporters of the white rose. The latter declared in favour of Perkin: the former, who had lately been disgraced by Henry, returned an ambiguous but courteous answer. The adventurer had yet no apparent reason to be displeased with his reception; when he suddenly accepted an invitation from the ministers of Charles VIII., to visit France, and place himself under the protection of that monarch. He was received by the king as the real duke of York, and the rightful heir to the English throne. For his greater security a guard of honour was allotted to him under the command of the lord of Concessault †: and the English exiles and outlaws, to the number of one hundred, offered him their services by their agent sir George Neville. Henry was perplexed and alarmed. He hastened to sign the peace ^{Nov. 3.} with the French monarch; and Charles instantly ordered the adventurer to quit his dominions. This order betrays the real object of the countenance which had been

† Of a Scotch family of the name of Monipeny. If I understand rightly a letter of Ramsey lord Bothwell, Concessault told him that he and the admiral of France had made many inquiries respecting the birth of the adventurer, but to no purpose. given to his pretensions: perhaps it may explain why he made his appearance at that particular period *.

Leaving France, he solicited the protection of Margaret, the dowager duchess of Burgundy, who received him with joy, appointed him a guard of thirty halberdiers, and gave him the surname of "The white rose of England." Her conduct revived the alarm of the king, and the hopes of his enemies. Could the aunt, it was asked, be deceived as to the identity of her nephew? Or would so virtuous a princess countenance an impostor? Henry spared neither pains nor expense to unravel the mystery. His agents were distributed through the towns and villages of Flanders, and valuable rewards were offered for the slightest information. The Yorkists were equally active. Their secret agent sir Robert Clifford was permitted to see "the white rose," and to hear from the pretender and his aunt the history of his adventures. He assured his employers in England that the claim of the new duke of York was indisputable; while the royal emissaries reported that his real name was Perkin Warbeck; that he was born of respectable parents in the city of Tournay; that he had frequented the company of the English merchants in Flanders, and had some time before sailed from Middleburgh to Lisbon in the service of lady Brompton, the wife of one of the outlaws †.

With this clue Henry was satisfied, and immediately despatched sir Edward Poynings, and Dr. Warham, as his ambassadors to the archduke Philip, the sovereign of Burgundy. Their ostensible object was to renew the treaties between England and the Netherlands; but their secret instructions commissioned them to demand the surrender, or, if that could not be obtained, the expulsion of Warbeck. The ministers of the archduke were divided, some maintaining the identity, others the imposture of the pretender. An answer was ultimately returned, that Philip, through friendship for the king, would abstain from affording aid to his enemy, but that he could not control the duchess, who was absolute mistress within the lands of her dower. Henry, to manifest his displeasure, withdrew the mart of English cloth from Antwerp to Calais, and strictly prohibited all intercourse between the two countries*.

Clifford, and Barley his associate, had gone to Flanders, as the envoys of the Yorkists: others, spies in the pay of Henry, repaired to Brussels under the pretence of testifying their attachment to the new duke of York. These, the moment they had wormed themselves into the confidence of the adventurer, betrayed to the king all his secrets, with the names of his partisans. The consequence was, that on the same day the lord Fitzwalter, sir Simon Mountford, sir Thomas Thwaites, Robert Ratcliffe, William Daubeney, Thomas Cressemer, Thomas Atwood, and several clergymen, were apprehended on the charge of high treason. Their correspondence with the friends of the pretender in Flanders was considered a sufficient proof of their guilt; and all received judgment of death. Mountford, Thwaites, and Ratcliffe, suffered immediately; lord Fitzwalter was imprisoned at Calais, where three years later he forfeited his life by an unsuccessful attempt to escape. The rest were pardoned: but this act of vigour astonished and dismayed the unknown friends of the adventurer, many of whom, conscious of their guilt, and sensible that their associates had been betrayed, fled for security to the different sanctuaries†.

There remained, however, one, who, while he flattered himself that he possessed a high place in the royal favour, had been secretly marked out for destruction. After the festivities of Christmas, Henry repaired with his court to the Tower. Clifford, whose fidelity had been corrupted by promises and presents, arrived from

Flanders, was introduced to the king in council, and on his knees obtained a full pardon. Being exhorted to prove his repentance by discovering what he knew of the conspiracy, he accused the lord chamberlain, sir William Stanley. The king started with affected horror, and refused to give credit to the charge. To sir William he was indebted both for his crown and his life. At the battle of Bosworth, when he was on the point of sinking under the pressure of the enemy, that nobleman had rescued him from danger, and had secured to him the victory. But Clifford repeated the accusation with greater boldness, and Henry, out of apparent tenderness to his friend, desired sir William to confine himself to his apartment in the square tower, and to reserve his defence till his examination on the following morning. Whether it arose from consciousness of guilt, or from confidence in his past services, the prisoner confessed the truth of the charge; on that confession he was arraigned and condemned at Westminster; and after a decent interval suffered the punishment of decapitation. His death gave rise to contradictory reports. By some it was said that he had supplied the pretender with money: by others, that when he was solicited to declare for him, he had replied: "Were I sure that he was the son of Edward, I would never fight against him *." This at least is probable, that unless he had been really entangled in the conspiracy, Henry would never have proceeded to the execution of a nobleman, to whom he was under so many obligations: but the king's avarice provoked a suspicion that the enormous wealth of the prisoner was the chief obstacle to his pardon. By his death, plate and money to the value of forty thousand pounds, with lands to the amount of three thousand pounds a-year, devolved to the crown. A reward of

Three years had now elapsed since the pretender first set forth his claim ; and yet, during that long interval, he had never made any attempt to establish it by legal proof, or to enforce it by an appeal to the sword. This protracted delay, the accounts which had been published of his country and parentage, the punishment of his friends in England, and the pacification of Ireland, made his cause appear desperate ; and both the Flemish, whose commerce had been suspended on his account, and the archduke, whose treasury suffered from the deficiency of the customs, began to complain of the countenance which he had hitherto received from the duchess Margaret. In this emergency he sailed from the coast of Flanders with a few hundreds of adventurers attached to his fortunes, and, while Henry was on a visit to his mother at Latham in Lancashire, made a descent in the neighborhood of Deal. But the inhabitants, either believing him an impostor, or urged by the fear of incurring the royal displeasure, attacked the invaders, made one hundred and sixty-nine prisoners, and drove the remainder into their boats. All the captives were hanged by the order of Henry, some in London, and others in different parts of the coast†. Warbeck, despairing of success in England, sailed to Ireland, and with the aid of the earl of Desmond laid siege to Waterford. Sir Edward Poynings was Lord Deputy for Henry, duke of York, the king's second son, only four years of age. He immediately raised the royal standard, hastened to Waterford, and compelled Perkin to flee, with the loss of

Henry now thought it expedient to summon parliaments both in Ireland and England. In the Irish parliament, statutes were enacted to free the lower classes of inhabitants from the grievous impositions of coyne and livery; to break the power of the great lords by the prohibition of maintenance; to preserve the English ascendancy within the pale by the revival of the statutes of Kilkenny †; and to provide for the good government of the English domains by giving to all statutes "lately made in England, and belonging to the public weal of the same," the force of law in Ireland. As the people had been harassed by frequent parliaments, in which ordinances were repeatedly made for the sole profit of the chief governor, or of the party which he espoused, it was enacted that for the future no parliament should be holden till the king had been informed, by the lieutenant and council, of the necessity of the same, and of the acts intended to be passed in it, and had previously given his license and approbation under the great seal ‡. In these provisions the deputy appears to have had no other object than the welfare of the state: but he was thought to have been swayed by private considerations in the act of attainder which he procured against the earl of Kildare, his family, and adherents. Henry, however, whose object it was to strengthen his interest in the sister island, accepted the apology offered by Kildare, A. D. and received him again to favour. In the English parliament, a bill of attainder was passed, at the king's request, against twenty-one gentlemen who had suffered, or had been condemned, for their adhesion to the pretender. The other acts of the session were to ratify Oct. the peace of Estaples, according to one of the articles of 27. the treaty †; and to enact the penalty of forfeiture against all persons holding fees, annuities, or offices from the crown, (and to these were afterwards added, all possessing lands, hereditaments, and honors by letters patent ‡,) who should neglect to attend in person the king in his wars. But the nation had now grown weary of civil dissension. The extinction or beggary of so many noble and opulent families had proved a useful lesson to the existing generation; and men betrayed a reluctance to engage in contests in which they knew from experience that they must either gain the ascendancy, or lose their lives or their fortunes. To obviate these disastrous consequences a statute was made, declaring that no one who should attend on the king and sovereign lord for the time being, to do him faithful service in the wars, should hereafter, on that account, whatever might be the fortune of battle, be attainted of treason, or incur the penalty of forfeiture. That this act might be set aside by the avarice or the resentment of a successful competitor was indeed evident: yet it was perhaps the best remedy that could be devised for the evil; and a hope was cherished, both from the reasonableness of the measure, and from the benefits which it promised to all parties, that in future contests it would be generally respected*.

A. D. 1496. Feb. 24. The repulse of Warbeck in his late expedition, and the complaint of the Flemish merchants, induced the archduke to solicit a reconciliation with Henry; and, after a few conferences between their respective envoys, the "great treaty of commerce between England and "the Netherlands" was signed. By it every facility was afforded to the trade of the two countries; but there was appended to it a provision, which from this period Henry inserted in every treaty with foreign sovereigns, that each of the contracting parties should banish from his dominions the known enemies of the other: and to preclude the possibility of evasion in the present instance, it was expressly stipulated that Philip should not permit the duchess to aid or harbour the king's rebels, but should deprive her of her domains if she acted in opposition to this engagement†. Warbeck could no longer remain in Flanders. He sailed to Cork; but the Irish refused to venture their lives in his service. From Cork he passed to Scotland, and exhibited, it is said, to the king, commendatory letters from Charles VIII. and his friend the duchess of Burgundy. James received the adventurer with kindness, saying that whosoever he might be, he should not repent of his confidence in the king of Scotland. Afterwards by advice of his council he paid to him the honours due to the prince whose character he had assumed; and to evince the sincerity of his friendship, gave to him in marriage his near relation, the lady Catherine Gordon, daughter to the earl of Huntley‡.

This sudden improvement in the fortune of the adventurer renewed the jealousy and apprehensions of the king, who had good reason to suspect the enmity of James. That prince, fifteen years of age, had been placed on the throne by the murderers of his father, a faction hostile to the interests of England; and Henry had in consequence entered into engagements with a party of the Scottish nobles, their opponents, who undertook to seize the person of the young sovereign, and to conduct him to London . Now, however, Fox, bishop of Durham, was commissioned to open a negotiation, and to tempt the fidelity of James with the offer of an English princess in marriage. But he listened rather to the suggestions of resentment or ambition, and demanded as the price of his forbearance terms to which the king refused his assent. Fox was followed by Concessault, as ambassador from the French monarch, who proposed that all subjects of dispute between the two kings should be referred to the decision of his sovereign; and when that was refused, offered him one hundred thousand crowns for the person of the adventurer, to be sent a captive into France †. The bribe was indignantly rejected by James, who coined his plate into money, obtained a small supply from the duchess of Burgundy, and engaged to place the pretender on the throne, on condition that he should receive as the reward of his services the town of Berwick, and the sum of fifty thousand marks in two years ‡. Warbeck had mustered under his standard fourteen hundred men, outlaws from all nations; to these James added all the forces it was in his power to raise; and the combined army crossed the borders in the depth of winter, and when no preparation had been made to oppose them. They were preceded by a proclamation, in which the adventurer styled himself Richard, by the grace of God king of England and France, lord of Ireland, and prince of Wales. It narrated in general terms his escape from the Tower, his wanderings in foreign countries, the usurpation of "Henry Tydder," the attempts to debauch the fidelity of his confidants, the execution and attainder of his friends in England, and the protection which he had received from the king of Scots. He was now in England, accompanied by that monarch, for the purpose of reclaiming his right; and James, whose only object was to assist him, had engaged to retire the moment that he should be joined by a competent number of natives. He therefore called on every true Englishman to arm in his cause; and promised to the man who should "take or distress Henry Tydder" a reward proportioned to his condition, "so as the most low and simplest of degree should have for his labour one thousand pounds in money, and lands to the yearly value of one hundred marks to him and his heirs for ever." But the proclamation had no effect. The novelty of the thing had worn away, and not a sword was unsheathed in favour of the white rose. The Scots, to console their disappointment, and to repay themselves for their trouble, pillaged the country without mercy, and returned, laden with spoil, to their homes.

As soon as the intelligence of this invasion reached Henry, he ordered Daubeney, the lord chamberlain, to raise forces, summoned a great council, and afterwards a parliament, and obtained a grant of two tenths and two fifteenths†. In most counties the tax was levied without opposition: in Cornwall the people, inflamed by the harangues of Flammock, an attorney, and of Joseph, a farmer, flew to arms; refused to pay their money for an object which, it was pretended, did not concern them but the natives of the northern counties;

and resolved, to the number of sixteen thousand men, to demand of the king the punishment of archbishop Morton, and sir Reginald Grey, the supposed authors of this unjustifiable impost. The misguided multitude commenced their march: at Wells they were joined by the lord Audley, who placed himself at their head, and conducted them through Salisbury and Winchester into Kent. Opposed by the gentlemen of the county, he turned towards London, and encamped on Blackheath in sight of the capital. But Henry had by this time been joined by most of the southern nobility, and by the troops that had been previously raised against the Scots. On a Saturday, (the king superstitiously believed that Saturday was his fortunate day,) the lord chamberlain marched to attack the insurgents; while the earl of Oxford made a circuit to fall on their rear; and Henry with the artillery waited in St. George's fields the event of the battle. The Cornish archers defended with obstinacy the bridge at Deptford strand: but the moment it was forced, the insurgents fled in despair. Two thousand were killed: fifteen hundred were taken. Lord Audley lost his head; Flammock and Joseph were hanged*; the rest obtained a pardon from the king, and were allowed to compound for their liberty with their captors, on the best terms in their power. This lenity, so unusual in Henry, was attributed by some to policy, and a desire to attach to his cause the men of Cornwall; by others to gratitude for the life of the lord chamberlain, whom the insurgents had made prisoner at the commencement of the action, and had restored to liberty without ransom.

While the attention of the king was occupied by the Cornish insurgents, James again crossed the borders, and laid siege to the castle of Norham, while his light troops scoured the country as far as the Tees. But the earl of Surrey, with twenty thousand men, was now hastening towards the north. The plunderers cautiously retired as he advanced: James abandoned the siege; and Surrey retaliated on the Scottish borderers the injuries which they had inflicted on their English neighbours. The failure of this second expedition, with the news of the defeat of the Cornishmen, induced the king of Scots to listen to the suggestion of don Pedro Ayala, the Spanish ambassador, who laboured with earnestness to reconcile the two monarchs. Commissioners met at Aytoun, in Scotland: Fox, the chief of the English envoys, was ordered by his private instructions to insist on the delivery of Perkin, because, "though the delyveraunce, or the havyng of hym was of no price or value, yet it was necessary to save the honour of the English king: and if that could not be obtained, that at least James should send to him an embassy, and consent to meet him at Newcastle." To these demands the Scottish prince demurred: Ayala then came forward as mediator, and James, satisfied with his impartiality, intrusted the interests of his crown to the discretion of the Spaniard. A truce was concluded for seven years, and subsequently prolonged by Ayala to the termination of one year after the death of the survivor of the two monarchs. Still there remained some demands on the part of Henry, which James considered derogatory from his honour; but the difficulty was surmounted by the ingenuity of Ayala, who proposed that these questions should be referred to the impartial decision of the Spanish monarch*.

The enthusiasm which had been excited by the first appearance of Warbeck in Scotland had long been on the decline; and about the time of the meeting of the commissioners, whether it were that he saw the current of public opinion setting against him, or hoped to profit by the troubles in Cornwall, or had received a hint from his royal protector (for all these reasons have been assigned), he departed from Scotland with four ships, and six score companions. He first touched at Cork, and solicited in vain the aid of the earl of Desmond. From Cork he directed his course across the channel to Whitsand bay; and proceeding by land to Bodmin, unfurled the standard of Richard IV. The men of Cornwall had not acquired wisdom from their recent defeat. Three thousand offered their services to the adventurer; and that number was doubled before he reached the city of Exeter. Here he formed his army into two divisions, with which he attempted to force his way by the only entrances into the city, the east and north gates. From one he was repulsed with considerable loss: the other he reduced to ashes; but the citizens fed the fire with fresh fuel till they had dug a deep trench behind it, between themselves and the enemy. On the next morning Warbeck returned to the assault; but the loss of two hundred men, and the arrival of aid to the besieged from the country, induced him to solicit a suspension of hostilities, during which he withdrew his followers. Many of these now abandoned him; but the Cornish men advised him not to despair; and he had reached Taunton, when he was apprised of the approach of the royal army under the lord chamberlain, and lord Brooke, the steward of the household. During the day the adventurer, with great ^{Sept.} composure of countenance, made preparations for battle; ^{21.} but his heart failed him at the sight of the royal standard; and at midnight, leaving his followers to their fate, he rode away, with a guard of sixty men, to the sanctuary of Beaulieu, in Hampshire. In the morning the insurgents submitted to the royal mercy. The ring-^{Oct.} leaders were hanged: the crowd, on the arrival of ⁷ Henry at Exeter, were led, bareheaded and with halters round their necks, into his presence, and discharged after a suitable admonition; and the inhabitants of the villages in which Warbeck had obtained either aid or refreshment were amerced in proportionate sums of money to the amount of ten thousand pounds. The pretender's wife, the lady Catherine Gordon, who had been left at Mount St. Michael, submitted at the first summons. When she was introduced to the king, she blushed and burst into tears*: but he relieved her apprehensions, and sent her to the queen, with whom she afterwards lived as an attendant, still retaining, on account of her beauty, the appellation of "the white rose," which she had originally derived from the pretensions of her husband†.

In the sanctuary of Beaulieu the fugitive had leisure to reflect on his melancholy situation. He saw the abbey constantly surrounded with a guard; he was repeatedly tempted to leave it by promises of pardon; and, after a severe struggle, resolved to throw himself on the mercy of the conqueror. The king did not violate his word, but refused to admit him into his presence. When he returned to London. Warbeck rode in his suite, surrounded by multitudes, who gazed with wonder at the man, whose claim and adventures had so long engaged their attention. He was conducted as a spectacle through the principal streets of the city; ordered to confine himself within the precincts of the palace; and repeatedly examined before a board of commissioners, as to his parentage, his instructors, and his associates. Whatever disclosures he made, were kept secret: but he grew weary of his confinement in the palace, and at the end of six months contrived to elude the vigilance of his keepers. The alarm was instantly given: patrols watched every road to the coast; and the fugitive, in despair of success, surrendered himself to the prior of the monastery at Shene. The monk encouraged him with the hopes of pardon, and by his solicitations extorted from the king a promise to spare the life of the suppliant. But he was compelled to stand a whole day in the stocks at Westminster hall, and the next in Cheapside; and on June both occasions to read to the people a confession which he had signed with his own hand. In this barren and unsatisfactory document he acknowledged that he was a native of Tournay, the son of John Osbeck and Catherine di Faro; gave the names and professions of his relations, and of the persons with whom he had lived at Antwerp, Middleburgh, and Lisbon; and stated that on his arrival at Cork he was taken first for Simnel, who had personated the earl of Warwick, then for an illegitimate son of Richard III., and lastly for the duke of York, the second son of Edward IV.; that he was invited into France by Charles VIII.; "from France he went into Ireland, from Ireland into Scotland, and so into England*." It is plain that this confession was composed from the disclosures which he had previously made. It describes with minuteness his parentage and original occupation, points which Henry wished to impress on the minds of the people, but was silent on subjects which it might have been unpleasant or impolitic to disclose, his transactions with foreign princes, and the assurances of support which he had received from native subjects. After suffering his punishment he was committed to the Tower †.

This seems to have been the age of intrigue and imposture. From the capture of Simnel to the appearance of Warbeck, Henry had been kept in constant alarm by repeated attempts in favour of the earl of Warwick.

* Hall, 49, 50. Grafton, 929. André, Domit. A. xviii. André was pensioned by Henry. Rym. xii. 643. His evidence (for he says the confession was printed by order of the king) proves its authenticity, which Mr. Laing has denied, because it is not mentioned by Fabyan or Polydore. Hen. xii. 444.

† Hall, ibid. Feb. 532. Stow, 481. From some imaginary improbabilities in the confession, it has been inferred that it was a mere fiction invented by Henry and his ministers. I should have thought that they might have invented a fiction of that description without crowding it with improbabilities.

About the close of 1498 a plan had been adopted to liberate that prince from prison: but it failed through the ignorance of the conspirators, who mistook the place of his confinement*. The following year a new plot was contrived in the council of the king of France, who sought to divert Henry from the threatened invasion of his dominions. That monarch had expressed his regret that he had ever granted assistance to the usurper of the rights of the house of York, and offered to the friends of the earl of Warwick ships, money, and troops, to place him on the throne of his ancestors. Letters were written to the retainers of his father the late duke of Clarence; lady Warwick was solicited to favour the enterprise; and an invitation was sent to the most distinguished of the Yorkists to repair to France, and take the command†. When this attempt also failed, Warbeck put forth his claim as the duke of York; and as long as he was able to prosecute it, the earl of Warwick seemed to be forgotten. Now that Warbeck was in prison, the rights of the earl were again brought forward; and a person of the name of Ralph Wulford undertook to personate the young prince. He was taught to act his part by Patrick, an Augustinian friar, and chose the county of Kent for the theatre on which he should make his first appearance. As a preparatory step a report was circulated of the death of Warwick; after a short interval the pretender whispered in the ears of a few confidants that he was the earl; and soon afterwards his instructor published to the world the important secret in a sermon. It is difficult to conceive on what they could ground their hope of success. Both were immediately apprehended. The friar was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Mar. Wulford paid with his life the forfeit of his temerity‡.

The real earl of Warwick, and the pretended duke of York were now fellow-prisoners in the Tower. They soon contracted a mutual friendship, wept over their common misfortune, and, whether it originated with themselves or was suggested to them by others, adopted a plan for Aug. their escape. Four of the warders were gained to murder the governor, and conduct the captives to a place of security, where, if we may believe the records of their trials, Warbeck was to be again proclaimed by the title of Richard IV.; and Warwick was to summon the retainers of his father to the standard of the new king. Warbeck was indicted in Westminster hall, as a foreigner, guilty of acts of treason since his landing in England. He received sentence of death, and at the Nov. place of execution affirmed on the word of a dying man 16. the truth of every particular contained in his original confession. With him suffered his first adherent O'Water; and both, expressing their regret for the imposture, asked forgiveness of the king. Before their Nov. punishment the earl of Warwick was arraigned at the 21. bar of the house of lords. Of his own accord he pleaded guilty; the earl of Oxford as lord steward pronounced judgment; and after a few days Henry signed the warrant for the execution of the last legitimate descendant of the Plantagenets, whose pretensions could excite the jealousy of the house of Tudor*.

Warwick owed his death to the restless officiousness of his friends, who by repeated attempts had convinced Henry that the existence of the earl was incompatible with his own safety. Still it will be difficult to clear the king from the guilt of shedding innocent blood. This victim of royal suspicion had been confined from childhood for no other crime than his birth. Certainly he was justified in attempting to recover his liberty. Had he even been guilty of the other part of the charge, his youth, his ignorance, his simplicity, and the peculiar circumstances of his situation, ought to have saved him from capital punishment*. The whole nation lamented his fate; and to remove the odium from the king, a report, probably false, was circulated that Ferdinand of Spain had refused to bestow his daughter Catherine on the prince of Wales as long as so near a claimant of the house of York was alive. Catherine herself had been told of the report, and in the following reign was heard to observe that she could never expect much happiness from her union with the family of Tudor, if that union had been purchased at the price of royal and innocent blood†.

From this period the ambition of Henry was no more alarmed by pretenders to the crown, nor his avarice distressed by the expense of foreign expeditions. The principal events of his reign during the ten years of tranquillity which preceded his death, may be comprised under the two heads, of his treaties with other powers, and his expedients to amass money.

I. 1. Henry was not less careful than the French monarchs to preserve the alliance between the two crowns. His object was to ensure the payment of the annual pension secured to him by the treaty of Estaples: theirs to afford him no pretext to oppose the progress of their arms in the conquest of Italy. In 1494 Charles had poured a numerous army over the Alps into the plains of Lombardy; the native princes yielded to the pressure of the torrent; and in a few months Naples was converted into a province of the French monarchy. But it was lost with the same rapidity with which it had been won. The pope, the king of the Romans, the king of Castile, the duke of Milan, and the republic of Venice entered into a league, by which they guaranteed to each other their respective dominions; and Charles was compelled to abandon his conquest, and to fight his way through his enemies, that he might return to his native kingdom. The next year Henry acceded to the general confederacy, a measure which might intimidate the French king, and by intimidating, cause him to be more punctual in the discharge of his pecuniary obligations. In 1498 Charles died, and was succeeded by Louis XII. ^{A. D. 1498.} That prince, who inherited the passion of his predecessor for the conquest of Naples, cheerfully ratified the 7. treaty of Estaples, bound himself by the most solemn oaths to pay the remainder of the debt, and signed Henry's favourite stipulation, that if a traitor or rebel to either prince should seek refuge in the dominions of the other, he should be delivered up within twenty days at the requisition of the offended party*.

2. The truces between England and Scotland, though frequently renewed and enforced with menaces and punishments, were but ill observed by the fierce and turbulent inhabitants of the borders. Soon after the last pacification, the garrison of Norham grew jealous of the repeated visits which they received from their Scottish neighbours. One day a serious affray was the consequence; and the strangers, after losing some of their fellows, fled for protection to the nearest post of their countrymen. The intelligence was received with indignation by James, who instantly despatched a herald to Henry, to announce that the truce was at an end; and a war must have ensued had not the English monarch ^{A. D. 1495.} been as phlegmatic as the Scottish was irascible. Fox, ^{Nov.} bishop of Durham, to whom the castle belonged, first wrote to James, and afterwards visited him at the abbey ^{1496.} of Melrose; and so successful were the address and elo- ^{Sep. 2.} quence of that prelate, that the king was not only appeased, but offered, what he had formerly refused, to marry Margaret the eldest daughter of Henry†. By the English prince the offer was most joyfully accepted; and when some of his council expressed a fear that then, in failure of the male line, England might hereafter become an appendage to the Scottish crown. "No," he replied, "Scotland will become an appendage to the English; for the smaller must follow the larger kingdom." The event has verified the prediction; and the marriage has been productive of more substantial benefits than Henry could probably foresee. It has not only united the two crowns on one head; it has also contributed to unite the two kingdoms into one empire*.

It would be tedious to narrate the repeated and protracted negotiations respecting this marriage. The parties were related within the prohibited degrees, and the princess was not of sufficient age to make a contract valid in law. Both these impediments were removed by
 A. D. a papal dispensation. Henry consented to give with his 1502. daughter the paltry sum of thirty thousand nobles, to be
 Jan. paid in three yearly instalments; and James put her in
 24. legal possession of lands to the annual value of two thousand pounds, reserving to himself the right of receiving the rents during his life, but with the obligation of defraying the expenses of her household, and of paying to her yearly five hundred marks in money†. The parties were now solemnly affianced to each other in the queen's chamber, the earl of Bothwell acting as proxy for James; tournaments were performed for two days in honour of the ceremony; and to exhilarate the populace twelve hogsheads of claret were tapped in the streets, and twelve bonfires kindled at night‡. At the same time was concluded, after one hundred and seventy years of war, or of truces little better than war, a treaty of perpetual peace between the two kingdoms, accompanied with the

* Bacon, 119. † Rym. xii. 787—793. As the noble was 6s. 8d. the whole portion amounted to no more than 10,000*l.* The noble was also equal to a Scottish pound.

‡ The form was as follows: "I Patrick earl of Bothwel, procurator, &c., contract matrimony with thee Margaret, and take thee into and for the wiffe and spous of my soveraigne lord James king of Scotland, and all uthir for thee, as procurator forsaid, forsake, induring his and thine lives naturall, and thereto as procurator forsaid, I plight, and gives thee his faythe and truthe." usual clause respecting the surrender of traitors, and a promise that neither prince would grant letters of protection to the subjects of the other without having previously obtained his permission. James, however, was careful that his new engagements should not interfere with the ancient alliance between Scotland and France. When he swore to observe the treaty, he had given to Henry the usual title of king of France; but he instantly ^{A. D.} 1502. arose, protested that he had done it inadvertently, and Dec. repeated the oath with the omission of that word; and ^{10.} when he was requested by his father-in-law not to renew the French league, he acquiesced for the time, but reserved to himself the power of renewing it, whenever he should be so advised *.

At the time of the contract the princess was but twelve years of age, and James had consented that she should remain twenty months longer under the roof of her royal parents. At length she departed from her grandmother's palace at Colliveston, with a long train of ladies and ^{A. D.} 1503. gentlemen, who accompanied her a mile, kissed her, and ^{July} returned to the court. The earl of Kent, with the lords ^{8.} Strange, Hastings, and Willoughby, escorted her as far as York. She rode on a palfrey attended by three footmen, and was followed by a magnificent litter drawn by two horses, in which she made her entry into the different towns. In her suit were a company of players and another of minstrels. From York she proceeded under the care of the earls of Surrey and Northumber- ^{July} land to Lambertontkirk, where she was received by the ^{17.} Scottish nobility. James repeatedly visited her on her ^{Aug.} progress; and on her arrival in the neighbourhood of ^{1.} Edinburgh, mounted her palfrey, and rode with her be- ^{7.} hind him into his capital. The marriage ceremony was ^{8.} performed by the archbishop of Glasgow, and "the

3. Henry had always cultivated with particular solicitude the alliance of Ferdinand king of Castile and Aragon; and the more strongly to cement their friendship had proposed a marriage between his eldest son, Arthur prince of Wales, and Catherine the fourth daughter of the Castilian monarch. A preliminary treaty on this subject was concluded as early as the year 1492: it was followed in 1496 by another, according to which Ferdinand promised to give the princess a portion of two hundred thousand crowns; and Henry engaged that his son should endow her with one-third of his income at present, and one-third of the income of the crown, if he should live to wear it*. The marriage was postponed on account of the youth of Arthur: but when he had completed his twelfth year a dispensation was obtained to enable him to make the contract; and the marriage ceremony was performed in the chapel of his manor of Bewdley, where Catherine was represented by her proxy the Spanish ambassador†. She was nine or ten months older than Arthur, and when the latter had completed his fourteenth year, Henry demanded her of her parents. She parted from them at Grenada, traversed Spain to Corunna, and landed at Plymouth, after a wearisome and boisterous voyage. The king met her at Dogmersfield‡, where she renewed to Arthur the contract which had been made by her proxy; the marriage ceremony was performed in St. Paul's; and at the door of the cathedral, and in the presence of † Rym. xii. 754. As almost three years elapsed between the treaty of marriage and the contract, this delay has been urged as a proof that Ferdinand would not consent to it till he was assured that the life of the earl of Warwick, the real heir, would be taken by Henry. But the fact is, that this was the earliest period stipulated in the treaty (Rym. xii. 663), which provided that, as soon as Arthur had completed his twelfth year, the parents might, if they pleased, apply to the pope for a dispensation.

‡ An unexpected difficulty occurred on the road to Dogmersfield. The prothonotary of Spain met the king, and told him that the Spanish noblemen who had charge of the princess had been charged by their sovereign that "they should in no manner of wise permit their lady to have any meeting, ne to use any manner of communication, neither to receive any companye, untill the inception of the very daye of the solemnisation of the marriage." But Henry declared that he would be master in his own kingdom; he entered her chamber, introduced his son to her, and caused them to renew the former contract. Let. Coll. v. 362—365.

the multitude, Arthur endowed her with one-third of ^{Nov} his property*. The king spared no expense to testify ¹⁴ his joy by disguisings, tournaments, and banquets; and several of the nobility, to flatter the monarch, indulged in a magnificence which proved ruinous to their families†. The abilities of Arthur, the sweetness of his temper, and his proficiency in learning‡, had gained him the affection of all who knew him; and his bride by her beauty, modesty, and accomplishments, became the object of general admiration. The castle of Ludlow in Shropshire was assigned for their residence; their court represented in miniature the court of their royal parent; and the prince amidst his vassals was instructed by his council in the rudiments of government. But the weak- ^{A. D.} ^{ness} of his constitution sank under the rigour of the season, 1502. perhaps under the prevailing epidemic called the sweating ^{April} ² sickness; and the hopes of the nation were unexpectedly blighted by his premature death in the fourth month after his marriage§. The intelligence of this event

Speed (p. 988), who quotes a manuscript of André, the preceptor of Arthur.

§ The intelligence was first opened to the king by his confessor. He sent for the queen, who seeing him oppressed with sorrow, "besought his grace that he would first after God remember the weale of his owne noble person, the comfort of his realme and of her. She then saied, that my ladie his mother had never no more children but him onely, and that God by his grace had ever preserved him, and brought him where that he was. Over that, howe that God had left him yet a fayre prince, two fayre princesses; and that God is where he was, and we are both young ynough: and that the prudence and wisdom of his grace spronge over all christendome, so that it should please him to take this according thereunto. Then the king thanked her of her good comfort. After that she was departed and come to her owne chamber, natural and motherly remembrance of that great losse smote her so sorrowfull to the hart, that those that were about her were faine to send for the king to comfort her. Then his grace of true gentle and faithfull love in good hast came and relieved her, and showed her how wise counsell she had given him before: and he for his parte would thanke God for his sonn, and would she should doe in likewise." I have transcribed this account of Henry's con-

alarmed Ferdinand and Isabella, the parents of the young widow. Anxious to preserve the friendship of England, as a counterpoise to the enmity of France, they hastened to propose a marriage between their daughter and her brother-in-law, Henry, now apparent heir to the throne. The English monarch affected to receive the communication with indifference; and suspended his assent, that he might ascertain whether a more profitable bargain might not be made with some other court; while, on the other hand, the Spaniard, to quicken the determination, sought to alarm the avarice of his ally, by requiring the immediate return of Catherine, with the restoration of the one hundred thousand crowns, the half of her marriage portion, which had already been paid. The negotiation at length was opened: but it proved as difficult to wring money from Ferdinand, as to satisfy the expectations of Henry; and 1503. a year elapsed before it was finally agreed that the marriage should be contracted within two months after the arrival of a dispensation from the pope; that it should be solemnised when the young prince had completed his fourteenth year; and that Ferdinand should previously transmit to London another sum of one hundred thousand crowns, the remaining half of the portion of Catherine. The dispensation was obtained: the parties were contracted to each other*; but the Spanish monarch either could not or would not advance the money; and his English brother cared little for the delay. The princess, a widow, and in his custody, was an hostage for the good will of her father; and by retaining this hold on 1505. the hopes and fears of the Spaniard, he expected to exert from him concessions of still greater importance.

duet on so interesting an occasion, as it appears to me, to do away the charge which has been brought against him of treating Elizabeth with indifference and neglect. I shall add, that I have not met with any good proof of Henry's dislike of Elizabeth, so often mentioned by later writers. In the MS. of André, and the journals of the herald, they appear as if they entertained a real affection for each other, and Henry's privy purse expenses show that he often made to her presents of "money, jewels, frontlets and other ornaments, "and also paid her debts." See Excerpt. Hist. p. 86.

* Rymer, xiii. 81. 83. 89. 114.

On the day before the young Henry completed his fourteenth year, the canonical age of puberty, and the time fixed for the solemnization of the marriage, he was compelled to protest in due form, that he had neither done, nor meant to do any thing which could render the contract made during his nonage binding in law. It might be thought that this protestation was equivalent to a refusal: but the king assured Ferdinand that his only object was to free his son from all previous obligation; he still wished to marry Catherine; but was also free to marry any other woman*. Thus while he awakened the fears, he was careful to nourish the hopes of the Spaniard; an expedient by which he flattered himself that he should compel that monarch to submit to his pleasure in two other projects which he had now formed.

About ten months after the death of prince Arthur his mother Elizabeth died at the age of thirty-seven†. Henry's mourning might be sincere; but it was short, and he quickly consoled himself for his loss by calculating the pecuniary advantages which he might derive from a second marriage. The late king of Naples had bequeathed an immense property to his widow; her presumed riches offered irresistible attractions

* El se tenia por libre para casarse con quien quisiere. Zurita, vi. 193. En Zaragoza, 1610. The contract is in Collier, ii. rec. There was nothing very singular in this revocation. A valid contract of marriage could not be made before the male was fourteen, the female twelve years old; but a precontract might be made at an earlier age, which, as long as it remained in force, disabled each party from marrying any other person; either, however, was at liberty, on coming to age, to annul the precontract without seeking the consent of the other. Hence it was not uncommon for a parent or guardian to instruct the party for whom he was interested to seize the first opportunity of revoking the precontract, not with the fixed intention of preventing the marriage, but that he might extort more advantageous terms from the other party, or might gain time to avail himself of a more eligible match, if any such should chance to offer itself. In the present case the young Henry would end his fourteenth year on the morning of the 28th of June, 1505, when Catherine would be entitled by the treaty to claim the solemnization of their nuptials. On the 27th, therefore, he appeared in the court of the bishop of Winchester, and stated that he was now at or upon the age of puberty, and in order that he might not be hereafter supposed to have given his consent to the marriage hitherto intended between him and the princess Catherine, either by his silence or any of the other ways specified in the law, he did then and there revoke the former contract, and affirm that he did not intend by anything which he had done, or might do, to confirm it. He was now by law at liberty to marry any other person; but the subsequent conduct of his father shows that no such marriage was in actual contemplation.

to the heart of the English monarch ; and three private gentlemen were commissioned to procure an introduction to the queen under the pretext of delivering to her a letter from the dowager princess of Wales. In their report to the king they praised her person, her disposition, and her acquirements, but added the unwelcome intelligence that the reigning king had refused to fulfil the testament of his predecessor. Henry's passion was instantly extinguished : he cast his eyes on another rich widow, Margaret, the duchess of Savoy, and from an accident which he attributed to his good fortune, he derived a strong hope of succeeding in his suit.

- A. D. 1504. On the death of Isabella, queen of Castile, which crown she held in her own right, her husband Ferdinand surrendered the sceptre of Castile to his daughter Juana, the wife of the archduke Philip, but claimed the regency in virtue of the will of his late consort. The new king and queen, in the beginning of 1506, left the Netherlands to take possession of the Castilian throne : but the weather was unfavourable ; and, after struggling with adverse winds for more than a fortnight, they sought shelter in the harbour of Falmouth. It was in vain that their council objected. They went on shore in search of refreshment, and Henry grasped at the opportunity of deriving advantage from their indiscretion. In terms which admitted of no refusal he invited them to his court ; detained them during three months in splendid captivity, and extorted from them several valuable concessions as the price of their enlargement. 1°. Margaret of Savoy was the sister of Philip, and that prince was compelled to agree to a marriage between her and Henry, to fix the amount of her portion at three hundred thousand crowns ; each crown being equal in value to four shillings English ; of which sum one hundred thousand crowns should be paid in August, and the remainder by equal instalments within six years. Margaret was in the actual receipt of fifty thousand crowns, arising from her two doweries, as the widow of John, prince of Spain, and Philibert, duke of Savoy. This sum the king required to be settled on himself for his own use and benefit, while the princess would be amply indemnified by the income which she would receive as queen of England *. 2°. Henry had formerly obtained the consent of Maximilian that Charles, the infant son of Philip, should marry Mary, the youngest daughter of the English king. To this the captive prince, though he had formerly refused, now gave his assent †. 3°. A new treaty of commerce was negotiated between the subjects of the two kings, as prejudicial to the interests of the Flemish as it was favourable to those of the English merchants. 4°. The king lent to the archduke, on certain securities, the sum of 138,000*l.* towards the expense of his voyage to Spain. Lastly, Henry demanded the surrender of an individual whom he had long considered the most dangerous enemy of the house of Lancaster. This was Edmund, second son to the late duke of Suffolk. John earl of Lincoln, the eldest son, had fallen at the battle of Stoke, and had been attainted by parliament. When the duke himself died, Edmund claimed the honours and estate of his father : but Henry persisted in considering him as the heir of his attainted brother, maintained that he had no claim to the forfeited property, and compelled him to accept as a boon a small portion of the patrimony of his fathers, and to be content with the inferior title of earl ‡. It was impossible to ascribe the king's conduct to any other motive than a desire to humble a rival family ; and the earl by his ungovernable passions soon involved himself in difficulties and danger. He had killed a man who had offended him, was arraigned as a murderer at the king's bench, and commanded to plead the king's pardon. His pride could not brook this indignity ; and the court of his aunt, the duchess of Burgundy, received the fugitive. Henry, who, on what grounds I know not, is rep-

† Philip had previously engaged to marry Charles to Claude, daughter of Louis XII. of France. After Philip's death (25th Sept. 1506) Maximilian, fearing that Ferdinand might keep possession of Castile to the prejudice of his grandson, urged Henry to contract the young princes to each other, and then demand the regency of Castile, as guardian to his son-in-law. (Zurita, vi. 163.) He was deterred by his desire of marrying Juana ; but afterwards, a few months before his death, in defiance of the objections of Ferdinand, proceeded to the contract with the approbation of Maximilian and Margaret, Dec. 15, 1508. resented as desirous to inveigle him into greater indiscretions, prevailed on him to return. At the marriage of the prince of Wales, he vied in the splendour of his equipage, and his attentions to the royal family, with the most opulent and favoured of the nobility; and then, to the astonishment of the public, fled a second time, with his brother Richard, to the court of his aunt. Henry immediately foreboded an insurrection. Sir Robert Curson was despatched to act the part of a spy under the mask of friendship; and in a few weeks the earl's brother William de la Pole, the lord Courtenay, who had married one of the late queen's sisters, sir William Wyndham, and sir James Tyrrel, with a few others, were apprehended*. To the two first no other crime could be objected than their relationship to the fugitive; the other two were condemned and executed for having favoured the escape of the king's enemy: and all were afterwards attainted by parliament†. By this act of vigour the conspiracy, if any conspiracy existed, was suppressed in its birth; and Suffolk, left in extreme penury by the death of his aunt, after wandering for a time in Germany, had been permitted by the archduke Philip to reside in his dominions.

Henry now demanded of that prince the surrender of the fugitive. It was in vain that he pleaded his honour; he was given to know that he was himself a captive, and could only purchase his liberty by consenting to the captivity of the earl. Compelled to yield, he exacted from Henry a promise that he would respect the life of Suffolk, and on the surrender of the fugitive was permitted to prosecute his voyage. The earl was sent to the Tower. Though Henry thirsted for his blood, he feared to violate his engagement with Philip: but before his death he left an order for the execution of his victim as a legacy to the filial piety of his successor‡.

ourably fulfilled his engagements with Henry. To rid himself of them, he might have pleaded that they had been contracted when he was actually in duress; but he ratified them at Valladolid, and signed several bonds, charging himself and his dominions with the payment of the sums specified, and subjecting himself, in default of payment, to the penalties of excommunication *. He, however, was only one of the parties interested in the marriage of his sister Margaret. The consent of Maximilian and Ferdinand was also requisite: but while Henry was negotiating with these princes Philip died; ^{A. D.} 1506 and his widow Juana, in her own right queen of Castile, appeared to the imagination of the king a still more desirable ^{Sept.} bride than Margaret. ^{28.} There were, indeed, two obstacles to be surmounted, which would have deterred any other suitor. Juana laboured under a derangement of intellect, which rendered her incapable of giving her consent; and Ferdinand, her guardian, would naturally oppose any measure which might deprive him of the government of her dominions. But Henry was not discouraged. He relinquished the pursuit of Margaret, contended that the malady of Juana was only temporary, occasioned by the bad usage which she had received from her last husband, and trusted to his own ingenuity to remove the objections of her father. That monarch, unwilling to irritate a prince whom it was his interest to flatter, had recourse to delay: he represented the present state of his daughter's mind; he promised that if, on the recovery of her reason, she could be induced to marry, the king of England should be her husband. But Henry was suspicious of the king's sincerity; he insisted that his ambassador Astill should speak to the queen in private, and receive an answer from her own mouth; and apprehensive that his son's attachment to Catherine might lead to a clandestine union, he forbade them to see each other, treated the princess with severity, and endeavoured to subdue the obstinacy of the father by punishing the innocence of his daughter †.

* Chron. Catal. 93, 94.

† Catherine, in her letters to her father, professed to have no great inclination for a second marriage in England, but requested that her sufferings and wishes might be kept out of view. Así le dio a entender al rey su padre: cuando le supplcaba en lo que tocaba a su casamiento no mirase su gusto ni comodidad, sino solo lo que a el y sus cosas conveniese bien. Mariana, Hist. l. xx. c. 17.

However, the malady of Juana experienced no abatement. Henry desisted from his hopeless pursuit, and, accepting the apologies of Ferdinand for his delay in the payment of the marriage portion, concluded with him a new treaty, by which
 A. D. 1508. the Spanish monarch was bound to transmit to London
 Apr. one hundred thousand crowns in four half-yearly instal-
 Sept. ments, and Henry to permit the solemnization of the marriage on the arrival of the last. Two were received by the king at the appointed time: he died before the arrival of the third*. Perhaps I should apologise to the reader for this long and tedious detail: but the important controversy to which the marriage of Henry and Catherine gave birth, and the still more important consequences to which that controversy led, have imparted an interest to every circumstance which originally impeded or facilitated their union.

II. While the king sought by foreign alliances to add to the security of his family, he was equally solicitous to amass riches at the expense of his subjects. What they termed avarice, he denominated policy; observing that to deprive his adversaries of their wealth was to take from them the means of annoyance. But Henry's rapacity was not very scrupulous in its selection: it fed with equal appetite on his friends and his enemies. The men whom he employed as the agents of oppression were sir Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, both lawyers, of inventive heads, and unfeeling hearts; who despoiled the subject to fill the king's coffers, and despoiled the king to enrich themselves. The following are the chief of the numerous expedients by which they extorted money. 1. In the lapse of centuries the rigour of the feudal tenures had been gradually relaxed, and during the civil dissensions of the two roses many prestations had been suffered to sink into desuetude. But these ministers are said to have revived all the dormant claims of the crown; exacted with severity the payment of arrears; discovered and enforced forgotten causes of forfeiture; and extended the feudal services to estates holden by different tenures. 2. The ancient statutes had created a multitude of offences punishable by fine, imprisonment, and forfeiture, and had enacted the same penalties against officers who had failed in the execution of their duty. Under these two heads hosts of informers were employed to cull out fit subjects for prosecution; and when the real or supposed delinquent was brought before Empson or Dudley (they were barons of the exchequer), unless he consented to pay an exorbitant fine, he was committed to prison. New offers of composition were made to him, while he lingered in custody; on his refusal, judgment was passed against him, sometimes without any trial by jury*, sometimes according to the verdict of a jury previously packed for the purpose. 3. Outlawry was the general consequence of non-appearance in personal actions; but was always reversed, on the payment by the party of a moderate fine. These harpies had the ingenuity to multiply such proceedings, and the cruelty to wring from their victims the full amount of a year's income. By these arts, and others of a similar description, every class of subjects was harassed and impoverished, while a constant stream of wealth passed through the hands of Empson and Dudley, of which a part only was suffered to reach the treasury; the remainder they diverted to their own coffers†.

* The English historians seem entirely ignorant of the causes which for so many years delayed the marriage of Henry and Catherine. For the preceding narrative I have had recourse to the Spanish historians Zurita and Mariana, and have compared their statements with extracts from the original documents preserved among the records at Simancas, which have been copied for me by a friend in Spain. The receipts for the money in 1508 are signed by both Henries, the father and the son. The third payment was made to the young king in May, and the last in September 1509.

If we may credit a story related by Bacon, Henry was not less adroit, or less unfeeling than his two ministers. Of the partisans of the house of Lancaster, there was no one whose exertions or sacrifices had been greater than those of the earl of Oxford. That nobleman on one occasion had entertained the king at his castle of Henningham: and when Henry was ready to depart, a number of servants and retainers in the earl's livery was drawn up in two lines, to do honour to the sovereign. "My lord," said the king, "I have heard much of your hospitality, but I see it is greater than the speech. "These handsome gentlemen and yeomen that I see on each side of me are surely your menial servants?" The earl replied with a smile, "That, may it please your grace, were not for mine ease. They are most of them mine retainers, come to do me service at a time like this, and chiefly to see your grace." Henry affected to start, and returned: "By my faith, my lord, I thank you for your good cheer: but I may not endure to have my laws broken in my sight. My attorney must speak with you." He alluded to the statute against retainers, which had been passed in his first parliament; and the earl for his misplaced generosity was condemned to pay a fine of ten thousand pounds; an almost incredible sum, if we consider the relative value of money at that period*.

* By a statute of 11th of this reign, c. 3, judges of assize and justices of peace had power in informations for the king before them to hear and determine all offences and contempts against any statute unrepealed. It was repealed in the 1st of Henry VIII. Stat. of Realm, iii. 3.

The king had for years been visited with regular fits of the gout. His strength visibly wasted away, and every spring the most serious apprehensions were entertained for his life. Whatever might be the hopes with which he flattered himself, his preachers did not allow him to be ignorant of his danger. From the pulpit they admonished him of the extortion of his officers, and exhorted him to prepare for death by making reparation to the innocent sufferers. Henry does not appear to have been displeased with their freedom. He forgave all offences against the crown with the exception of felony and murder; satisfied the creditors of all persons confined for debts under the amount of forty shillings; and ordered strict justice to be done to all who had been injured by the tyranny of the ministers. The prosecutions, however, were soon revived: it was contended that no injustice could be committed where the conviction was procured by due process of law; and several of the most respectable citizens in London were heavily amerced, and in default of payment thrown into prison. Thus Empson and Dudley continued to pursue their iniquitous career till they were arrested by the death of the king, who in the spring of 1509 sunk under the violence of his disease. The anxiety of his mind is strongly depicted in the provisions of his will: but he might easily have foreseen that his injunctions for the reparation of injuries would be despised or eluded by a young and thoughtless successor*. He left three children; a son Henry, who inherited his father's crown, and two daughters, Margaret, married to James king of Scots, and Mary, afterwards the wife of Louis XII. king of France.

To Henry by his contemporaries was allotted the praise of political wisdom. He seems, indeed, to have been formed by nature for the circumstances in which accident had placed him. With a mind dark and mistrustful, tenacious of its own secrets and adroit in divining the secrets of others, capable of employing the most unprincipled agents, and of descending to the meanest artifices, he was able to unravel the plots, to detect the impostures, and to defeat the projects of all his opponents. But there was nothing open in his friendship, or generous in his enmity. His suspicions kept him always on his guard: he watched with jealousy the conduct of his very ministers, and never unbosomed himself with freedom even to his consort or his mother. It was his delight to throw an air of mystery over the most ordinary transactions: nor would pride or policy allow him, even when it appeared essential to his interests, to explain away the doubts, or satisfy the curiosity of his subjects. The consequence was, that no one knew what to believe, or what to expect. "All things," says sir Thomas More, "were so covertly demeaned, one thing pretended and another meant, that there was nothing so plain and openly proved, but that yet, for the common custom of close and covert dealing, men had it ever inwardly suspect, as many well counterfeited jewels make the true mistrusted*."

He appears to have been the first of our kings since the accession of Henry III. who confined his expenses within the limits of his income†. But the civil wars had swept away those crowds of annuitants and creditors that formerly used to besiege the doors of the exchequer; and the revenue of the crown came to him free from incumbrances, and augmented by forfeitures. Hence he was enabled to reign without the assistance of parliament; and, if he occasionally summoned the two houses, it was only when a decent pretext for demanding a supply offered to his avarice a bait which it could not refuse‡. He had, however, little to apprehend from the freedom or the remonstrances of these assemblies. That spirit of resistance to oppression, that ardour to claim and establish their liberties, which characterised the parliaments of former times, had been extinguished in the bloody feuds between "the two roses." The temporal peers who had survived the storm were few in number, and without the power of their ancestors: they feared by alarming the suspicions of the mo-

‡ During the last thirteen years of his reign he called but one parliament, in 1504. His object was to demand an equivalent in lieu of two reasonable aids due by the feudal customs for having made his eldest son a knight, and married his eldest daughter. It was, however, so contrived that he might have the merit of moderation, while he imposed the burden; and therefore when the parliament offered him 40,000*l.*, he accepted but 30,000*l.* Rot. narch to replunge themselves into the dangers from which they had so lately emerged; and the commons readily adopted the humble tone, and submissive demeanour of the upper house. Henry, and the same may be observed of his two last predecessors, found them always the obsequious ministers of his pleasure*.

But if the king was economical in his expenses, and eager in the acquisition of wealth, it should also be added, that he often rewarded with the generosity, and on occasions of ceremony displayed the magnificence, of a great monarch. His charities were many and profuse. Of his buildings, his three convents of friars fell in the next reign; his chapel at Westminster still exists, a monument of his opulence and taste. He is said to have occasionally advanced loans of money to merchants engaged in profitable branches of trade; and not only gave the royal license to the attempt of the Venetian navigator Cabot, but fitted out a ship at his own expense to join in the voyage. Cabot sailed from Bristol, discovered the island of Newfoundland, crept along the coast of Florida, and returned to England. It was the first European expedition that ever reached the American continent†.

* In the composition of these sheets, I have frequently been inclined to believe that we ascribe to the spirit of the commons in former times more than they really deserve. On many important occasions they appear to me to have been put forward and supported by the peers; on others to have been merely the instruments employed by the ruling party. If this be so, there can be no wonder that after the depression of the house of lords, they fell into a state of dependence on the crown.

† Rym. xii. 695. Hackluyt, iii. 4. [Dr. Lingard does not allude to the encouragement given to Columbus by Henry VII. when he sent his brother Bartholomew to that monarch, before the success of his application to Ferdinand and Isabella. It has been doubted by M. Beauchamp, in the Biogr. Universelle, whether any such encouragement were given, — but I see no reason to reject the authority, which is that of Fernando Columbus, the son of the Admiral. He thus describes Bartholomew's application: — "Having departed for England, his fortune willed that he should fall into the hands of pirates, who plundered him, with all who were in his ship. For which cause, and from his poverty and weakness, which attacked him cruelly in those strange lands, his embassy was prolonged for a great while, until, having earned something by his skill in making charts, he began to deal with Henry VII., father of Henry VIII., who now reigns: to whom he presented a map of the world." Fernando Columbus then transcribes the verses which were upon this map, which are dated Feb. 13, 1498, and adds "When

"the king of England saw this map, and heard what the Admiral offered him, with joyful face he accepted his offer, and sent for him. But because God had preserved it for Castile, the Admiral had already sailed at that time and returned with the victory of his undertaking." Fernand. Columb. ch. 13, copied in Hakluyt's 3d vol. ad init.

This map could not have been given to the king till some years after it was made. For Columbus sailed in 1492, and Bartholomew, returning, with Henry's invitation, to Spain, met at Paris the news of the great discovery. He joined Columbus in Hispaniola, during his second voyage. There is no mention in any contemporary English author of his visit to England. But Lord Bacon, writing about 1621, says: "It is certain also that the king's fortune had a tender of that great Empire of the West Indies. Neither was it a refusal on the king's part, but a delay by accident, that put by so great an acquiescent: for Christopher Columbus, refused by the king of Portugal (who would not embrace at once both east and west), employed his brother Bartholomaeus Columbus unto king Henry, to negotiate for his discovery: and it so fortuneed that he was taken by pirates at sea: by which accidental impediment he was long ere he came to the king: so long, that before he had obtained a capitulation with the king for his brother, the enterprise by him was achieved, and so the West Indies were then reserved for the crown of Castile." The language here seems to follow Fernando Columbus, and Bacon had probably seen his work, written perhaps 80 years before. But I cannot suppose that he had not the means of deciding whether it were true or false. Neither Hall nor Holinshed alludes to Bartholomew's visit. Anderson, Hist. Com. at 1489, says that Bartholomew Columbus in that year printed and dedicated to Henry the map of the world; — that the king was too penurious to assist him, but at length listened to his proposals. For this statement, at variance with Fernando Columbus's throughout, Anderson gives no authority. There are wood-cuts of Caxton's executed at a date a few years earlier than 1489, but no engraved map is now known near as early as that date, nor noticed among the authorities in the history of printing.

The encouragement which Henry gave to the Cabots is matter of more distinct record. Dr. Lingard has been misled, above, by Hakluyt's authorities, which have been set in more clear light by recent investigations. The transactions with these navigators do not redound so much to the credit of the monarch, as one might infer from the result of their voyages, which gave to England her first claim to North America. On the 5th of March, 1495-6, at the solicitation of John Cabot, Henry granted letters-patent to him and his sons, permitting them to sail with five ships in search of new lands, reserving to himself one-fifth of all commodities they brought thence, and giving them possession of their discoveries. But he did not advance a penny for the cost of this expedition. It sailed in 1497, and on June 24 discovered land; perhaps Newfoundland, — perhaps the coast of Labrador.

It appears, however, that it returned at once, for on the 10th of August following there appears this item in the Privy Purse Expenses of the king: — "To hym that founde the new Isle, £10." This appears among such entries as "To a litelle mayden that daunceth, £12." "To Jakes Haute for the tenes playe (tennis play), £10." "For the kinges losse at cards, £9." "To a woman for a redde rosse, 2s." Entries which in comparison show the value attached to the discovery. This is the only pecuniary encouragement of any sort which Henry is known to have given to the Cabots. He subscribed £70 to an adventure made by Launcelot Thirkeld and others to Newfoundland in the expedition of 1498 — (the second voyage, — not the first, as Dr. Lingard supposes); — and there are notices of two gifts, amounting to £25, which he made afterwards to Bristol merchants engaged in the trade thither. It was on the 3d of February, 1498, that he granted to the Cabots a second patent, permitting them to sail with six vessels for the New Found Land. On the 19th of March, 1501, he granted a patent for discovery to Richard Warde and others; and the next year another to Hugh Elyot and others. No other patent of discovery was granted for more than fifty years in England. Sebastian Cabot, meanwhile, having, under the second patent, sailed along our coast as far as Florida, returned to England only to meet the king's coldness. He furnished his third expedition of 1499 from private resources, the royal assistance having been refused. He took no part in any after English expedition for fifteen years.

Mr. Richard Biddle, in his Memoir of Sebastian Cabot, examines the authorities in Hakluyt iii. 4, and sets them clear in the light of new documents. These and the first patent, in Rymer, are Dr. Lingard's authorities for the statement above. Hakluyt brings together six accounts of the Cabots' voyages. One of these asserts that the king bore the charges of two ships, and one that he bore those of one. They are the weakest authorities of all, — they contradict each other, and are contradicted by each other, by the patent and the record of the Privy Purse.

The first is Baptista Ramusio's report of a statement which Sebastian Cabot had made in conversation to a Venetian gentleman. This narrative (in the 1st volume of Ramusio, not the 2d, as Hakluyt places it) is certainly incorrect in many of its particulars. •Indeed, it is proved so by a letter of Sebastian Cabot's, in the 3d volume of Ramusio's work. In Hakluyt it reads thus: — "The king immediately commanded two Caruels to bee furnished "with all things appertayning to the Voyage, which was, as farre as I remember, in the year 1496, in the beginning of Sommer." The narrative goes on, however, to describe the voyage of 1498, — the patent for which speaks of six ships. On referring to the original of Ramusio, Mr. Biddle finds that the Italian text is simply "Feci intendere questo mio pensiero alla "Majestà del Re, il qual fu molto contento et mi armò due Caravelle di tutto "ciò che era dibisogno et fu del 1496 nel principio della state." "I made "His Majesty the King understand this thought of mine, who was greatly "pleased with it, and provided two Caravels for me, with all that was needed; "and it was in 1496, in the beginning of the Summer." In this form, the anecdote puts into the mouth of Cabot a distinct statement of date which we know is untrue, — and, Ramusio quotes it with hesitation, acknowledging that he did not hear it made himself, and says specifically that he does not relate it circumstantially, and that the conversation passed long ago. We know the date is untrue. We know that Cabot's letter to Ramusio (in vol. liii.) contradicts other details. So that this is a very weak authority for the statement that Henry was at the cost of the expedition.

The other authority in Hakluyt is an extract made by John Stow from the MS. Chronicle of Alderman Robert Fabian. "Which ship," says the extract, "thus manned and victualled at the king's cost, divers merchants "of London ventured in her small stockes, being in her as chiefe Patrone, "the saide Venetian." [John Cabot.] It is as unfortunate as strange that in no printed edition of Fabian, nor in any MS. now known, is this passage to be found. In Stow's own annals, as printed in 1605, it exists, without Fabian's authority, and the expedition is ascribed to Sebastian Cabot instead of John. The passage no longer deserves the weight of a contemporary authority.

Hakluyt quotes also Gomara, whose real language, writing in 1552, is, that Sebastian Cabot "furnished two ships at his own charges, or, as some say, at the king's." It seems from Mr. Biddle, whose careful researches I am following, that in Hakluyt's time, to support, against Spain, the claim of England to North America, "it was deemed a matter of great importance "to show that the expedition was fitted out at the cost of Henry VII." Hakluyt therefore boldly strikes out here the words which show that Gomara had arrived at no conclusion on the point; and by this mutilation exhibits an unqualified averment that the whole was at the cost of Henry VII.

In face of this weak support for the impression that Henry fitted out a ship or two, there is the statement of Peter Martyr, who knew Sebastian

Cabot personally, who says distinctly that he was at his own charges. The royal patents intimate the same thing. I think therefore that the account of the Privy Purse Expenses, which gives but £70 as Henry's contribution to the second voyage, must be regarded as covering the whole of his venture. There is no pretence anywhere that he contributed anything but his permission to the first voyage.

This subject could not be set clear till after the discovery of the Privy Purse Expenses, and Mr. Biddle's discovery of the second patent. The dates are now certain.

If the land discovered by the Cabots, in 1497, were Labrador, as is most probable, they were by more than a year the first discoverers of the American continent. If this discovery were that of Newfoundland, the discovery of the continent did not take place till the next year. The expedition of 1498 sailed May 2. Sebastian Cabot passed westward, up Hudson's Straits apparently, till June 11, when his sailors compelled him to return. Before this time he had discovered the continent, which Columbus did not see till August 2 of the same year.

The extracts from the Privy Purse Expenses of King Henry, from which the memorandum above is copied, are in Excerpta Historica p. 85—133. They are edited from a transcript in the British Museum (additional MSS. No. 7099) compiled by Mr. Craven Orde from the originals in the King's Remembrancer's office. In that office, in Westminster Hall, it is said, the originals might probably now be found. As Mr. Orde's transcript begins at Dec. 24, 1491, it is to be hoped that some future investigation may find mention of some gratuity to Bartholomew Columbus before that time. John Cabot's Will, supposed by Mr. Biddle to be still extant in Worcester, England, is another document which we may hope to have recovered.

APPENDIX.

NOTE [A], Page 76.

[DR. LINGARD, I think, must have overlooked Michelet's authorities, to the point that the heroine's name was simply Darc, not D'Arc, or of Arc. Since Dr. Lingard died, a memoir published in Paris has set this matter beyond reasonable doubt. 1. Her own family wrote the name Darc. 2. She and her family were ennobled by Charles, a fact which shows that she did not before bear a noble title, as D'Arc would be. 3. There is no place named Arc, from which her family could have derived such a title. But I never change Dr. Lingard's text, and I have therefore left his reading "of Arc," in the two passages where it appears in the History.

The error, which is now almost universal in French and English, is of very early date. Shakspeare reads,

"His new-come champion, virtuous Joan of Arc."

But Hall, whom Shakspeare follows in this play, gives (in 1548) to the heroine no name except Joan (Hall's Chron. at date). Hall follows Monstrelet (1453), who does not seem to have known any name but Joan. Holinshed (1586) calls her throughout Jone Are, and her father James Are; yet in the margin he quotes Les Chron. de Bretagne, where the French is copied as being De Are. A fatality seems to attend the name. Dr. Lingard uses it but twice. In one of those passages, in the third London edition, it was printed Joan of Acre, by some patriot printer, I suppose, who remembered Sir Sydney Smith's success at St. Jean d'Acre, in Palestine. Southey quotes a contemporary tract where the name is spelt Tart. But he very coolly makes Joan say,

— "there, in the hamlet Arc
"My father's dwelling stands."

There is no such hamlet, and her father's dwelling was at Dompne, or Dom Remy.

The family were ennobled by the name of Du Lys, and, by a graceful but remarkable exception to the French law, as a woman's exploits ennobled it, the noblesse was made to descend to women as well as men. The grant of noblesse is dated Dec. 1429. But an arret issued in 1614 restricted the noblesse to men. The family has been extinct since June 29, 1760. — AMER. EDIT.]

NOTE [B], Page 208.

The Historie of the Arrivall, &c.

The contemporary tract, which is mentioned in this note as contained among the Harleian MSS. (543), has lately been printed for the Camden Society, under the eye of Mr. Bruce. It bears the title of "Historie of the Arrivall of Edward IV. in England, and the finall recovery of his Kingdomes, A. D. MCCCCXXI." It was apparently written immediately after the death of Henry VI., as it ends with the events of the 26th of May, and, we have reason to believe, by the order of Edward himself; for on the 29th of the same month that prince sent to his foreign friends at Bruges (and probably at other places on the continent) a messenger with an account of his success, which account appears to have been this very "Historie," if we may judge from the abridgment of it still preserved, with the copy of the king's letter, in the public library at Ghent. See Introduction vi. vii. Hence it will follow that this tract must be of high authority with respect to dates; and places, and the succession of events, but that it must also be liable to great suspicion on those particular points in which the character of the king is deeply concerned. We cannot expect that he should proclaim himself a perjurer and murderer, and, therefore, are not to be surprised if we find in it no mention of the oath which he is said to have taken at York, or of the part which he is believed to have acted at the death of Edward, the Lancastrian prince of Wales, and with respect to that of the old king, Henry VI.

If we may believe Fabian (660) and Polydore (517), at York Edward protested upon oath that he had no other object in view than the recovery of his rightful inheritance, as son of the late duke of York. Of this oath there is no trace in "The Historie," but it records his "determination that he and all those of his felowshipe shuld noyse and say openly, where so evar they came, that his intent and purpos was only to claime to be duke of Yorke, and to have and enjoy th' enheritaunce that he was borne

"unto by the right of the full noble prince his fathar, and none other" (p. 4). At three miles from Yorke the recorder met him, "and tolde him that it was not good for him to come to the citie, for eyther he shuld not be suffered to enter, or els, in caas he enteryd, he was lost and undone with all his" (p. 5). "Within a while Robart Clifford and Richard Burghe gave him and his feloshipe bettar comfort, affirmyng that in the qwarel aforesayde of his father the duke of Yorke he shuld be receyvyd and sufferyd to passe" (ibid.) At length he arrived at the gates of the city, and whilst his army remained without, was suffered to enter, "with xvi. or xvii. persons" in the leading of the sayde Clifford and Richard Burghe, "and came to the worshipfull folks which were assembled a little within the gates, and shewed them th' entent and purpos of his coming in such form and with such maner langage that the people contentyd them therewith and so receyvyd him and all his felawshipe" (ibid.) The next day he left the city. It appears to me that this very narrative, in other points confirmative of Polydore's narrative, is also confirmative of it in this, that to content the worshipful folks of York Edward was compelled to take the oath before mentioned.

At the battle of Tewksbury Edward was opposed to that portion of the Lancastrian force which was commanded by prince Edward. He put the young man and his followers to flight, and pursued the fugitives with great ardour. "In the wynnynge of the fieldes, such as abode handstrokes were slayne incontinent, Edward, called prince, was taken fleinge to the towne wards, and slayne in the fieldes" (30). Hence it appears that the young prince did not abide hand-strokes, but was taken in his flight, and then slain. But by whose orders? "The Historie" is silent. The chroniclers tell us that the captors took him to Edward, who asked him questions, and that he was then slain in his presence, by his brothers, or their attendants.

That he was taken to Edward is highly probable, for, as the king was in their company, the captors would of course present their prize to him; and the authors of the murder are significantly intimated by the best authority, the Croyland continuator. Interfectis de parte reginae tum in campo tum postea, ultricibus quorundam manibus ipso principe Edwardo ungento regis Henrici, victo ducae

Somersetiae comiteque Devoniae, ac aliis dominis omnibus et singulis memoratis. Cont. Croyl. 555. Of the persons here mentioned, the only one slain in the field, in campo, was prince Edward; all the others were captives; the only one slain ultreibus quorundam manibus was prince Edward, for the others suffered by the hand of the executioner, after judgment in the court of the lord high constable and the earl marshal. The vengeful persons who embrued their hands in his blood must have been some of the royal brothers.

NOTE [C], Page 251.

In perusing the petition presented to the protector at Baynard's castle, the attention of the reader will probably have been drawn to the alleged precontract of marriage between Edward and Eleanor Boteler. I shall make a few observations on the subject in the present note.

1. It was now eighteen years since the marriage of the king with Elizabeth Grey. The validity of that marriage had never yet been disputed. The children by it had been considered as legitimate by the parliament, the nation, and foreign sovereigns. They were acknowledged heirs to their father, and several of them had been contracted to princes of the first houses in Europe.

2. If any marriage had previously taken place, which would have annulled the succeeding marriage, would it not have been discovered and objected by those who opposed the union of the king with Elizabeth Grey; by the numerous and violent enemies of that princess and her family; and by Clarence and Warwick during their rebellion, when no one had any reason to fear the resentment of Edward? If they had heard of it, and yet did not allege it, the very circumstance is a proof that they knew the report to be groundless.

3. The time when it was at last brought forward furnishes a strong presumption against it. It was not till both the parties concerned were laid in their graves, almost twenty years after it was supposed to have taken place, and for the avowed purpose of enabling an uncle to disinherit his nephews.

4. There is no proof that witnesses were ever examined, or that any documents were produced to show the existence of the precontract in question, though it so much concerned Richard for his own security to place it beyond the reach of doubt. The only authority on which it rests is the assertion in the petition presented to the protector at Baynard's castle, an authority which will have little weight with the impartial reader. That petition was said to have been composed and forwarded to London by the gentlemen in the north: but every one knew that it was written in that city by Dr. Stillington, bishop of Bath, and president of Richard's council (Cont. Croyl. 567). Le Evesque de B. fist le bill. (Year-book, Hilary term, 1 Hen. VII. Rym. xii. 189.) If it be said that it was approved by Richard's parliament in 1484 (Rot. Parl. vi. 240); it may be replied that the next year it was condemned by another parliament "for the false and seditious imaginations and untruths thereof," (ibid. 289) and pronounced by the judges false, slanderous, and shameful. (Year-book, ibid.) The only contemporary, by whom it is mentioned, treats it with little ceremony as seditious and infamous. Cont. Croyl. 567.

5. Though no ancient historian has written in favour of the alleged precontract, it has been warmly maintained by two modern writers, Walpole in his Historic Doubts, and Laing in a dissertation at the close of Henry's History of England. I shall briefly notice the four arguments which they have adduced.

6. More informs us that after Edward "had between them twain ensured Elizabeth," he communicated the matter to his council; that his mother, to prevent the marriage, objected that he "was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucy, and her husband before God;" that Lucy was sent for and examined upon oath; and that, "albeit she was by the king's mother and many other put in good comfort to affirm that she was ensured unto the king, yet when she was solemnly sworn to say the truth, she confessed that they were never ensured." howbeit his grace spoke so loving words unto her, that she verily hoped he would have married her." More, 59, 60. It is difficult to reconcile this story, as it is told by More, with the account of Edward's marriage with Elizabeth Grey, as it is given by all other writers. Ac-

according to them it was clandestine, according to him it was publicly solemnised. But what is there in it to favour the precontract of marriage with Eleanor Boteler? Laing supposes that More has wilfully substituted Elizabeth Lucy for Eleanor Boteler, that the objection of the king's mother was good, and that the lady was compelled by Edward to give false evidence as to the contract between them. But if such suppositions are to be admitted, merely because they are convenient for the purpose of the writer, there is an end to all faith in history.

7. We are then led to the testimony of Commines, who informs us that Stillington had been formerly in favour with Edward, had incurred his displeasure, been imprisoned, and paid a large sum for his liberty. This prelate, if we may believe him, declared to Richard that Edward had formerly contracted marriage with a certain lady in his presence, that the contract was meant only to deceive her, and that he had concealed its existence for twenty years. He adds, that to reward him, Richard promised to give the princess Elizabeth, now considered as a bastard, to an illegitimate son of the bishop; but the young man was cast on the coast of Normandy, carried to the châtelet at Paris, and by some mistake starved to death. Com. lvi. c. ix. Those who have perused the foreign writers of these ages know how little they are to be credited, when they write of English affairs: but admitting the whole of this account, it will go but a short way towards the proof of the marriage. We knew before that Stillington composed the petition; we now know that he also suggested its contents. Whether those contents were true or false, Commines does not hazard a conjecture. Laing supposes that Edward imprisoned the bishop, to extort from him the contract, or to punish him for disclosing the secret. But neither hypothesis can stand. The historian assures us that Stillington kept the secret till Edward's death: and the idea of extorting from him the contract arises from a mistake as to the meaning of the words, "avoit faits la promesse entre les mains du dit évesque;" which allude to the manner in which such verbal promises were received, not to any written contract deposited in the hands of the bishop, as Laing translates it. The true reason of Stillington's disgrace (we have no knowledge of his imprisonment) may be found in Rymer, xii. 66. Soon after the attainder of Clarence, he was accused of having violated his oath of allegiance, probably by having associated with Clarence. He repaired to a great council of lords and prelates, proved his innocence to their satisfaction, was declared a loyal subject, and afterwards employed in several offices of great trust and importance.

8. Sir Thomas More's history terminates abruptly in the midst of a conversation between the duke of Buckingham and the bishop of Ely. Hall continues that conversation, without informing us where he obtained it; and makes the duke say, "Richard brought in" (to the lords forming his private council) "instruments, authentic doctors, proctors, notaries of the law, with depositions of divers witnesses, testifying Edward's children to be bastards; which depositions I then thought to be as true as now I know them to be false and feigned, and testified by witnesses with rewards untruly suborned." Hall, f. 33. Hence Laing argues that proof of the precontract was produced to the council. But it may be replied, that these depositions were never judicially examined; that they are pronounced false, and purchased with money by the very authority here cited: and lastly, that the whole speech is a mere fiction. For the duke is made to say, that Richard refused to restore to him the Hereford estate of which he had been deprived by Edward, though the truth is that Richard actually restored it to him (Dugd. Bar. i. 168, 169. ii. 248); and if we may believe More himself, did not un-courteously refuse any one of his petitions. More, 70.

9. When Henry VII. had married Elizabeth, the daughter of Edward, the act which bastardised the children of that prince was repealed. It had been customary on such occasions to rehearse the whole of the act, or to particularise its object, both of which were now by the advice of the judges omitted, and in their place the first words were inserted as sufficient to point out what individual act was repealed. A motion at the same time was made to call Stillington before the parliament, but was opposed by the king. Hence Laing infers that Henry was satisfied the legitimacy of his wife would not bear investigation. But a complete answer may be given. The judges declared that their object was to prevent so false and shameful a calumny from appearing on the rolls of parliament (Year-book, Hilary term, 1 Henry VII.); and the king replied, that as he had already granted a pardon to Stillington, he could not prosecute him for the offence. More, 73.

10. On the whole, it appears to me evident that Elizabeth was the real wife of Edward, and that the pre-contract was a fiction invented to justify Richard's usurpation.

NOTE [D], Page 256.

I PURPOSE in this note to examine the arguments which have been employed to clear the memory of Richard from the imputation of having murdered his nephews.

1. It would be difficult to name a writer more deserving of credit than the Croyland historian, who composed his narrative in the month of April following the death of Richard. He tells us that a widely extended confederacy had been formed to liberate the two princes from the Tower, and that the rising was on the point of taking place, when it was made public that both of them had perished. (Cont. Croyl. 568.) It has been said that this was a mere report raised by the conspirators themselves, and that the writer gives no opinion as to its truth. But, 1^o. It could not have been raised by the conspirators, because it compelled them to defer their intended insurrection, and to look out for some other chief. (Ibid.) And, 2^o. The writer proceeds with his narrative as if he believed the princes to be dead, and makes use of expressions which he would not have used if he had entertained any doubt of their murder. He says that it is not known by what particular kind of violent death they perished (quo genere violenti interitus ignoratur, ibid.); that their cause had been avenged in the battle of Bosworth field (quorum causa hoc bello potissime vindicata est, p. 575); and that Richard, not content with obtaining the treasures of Edward, destroyed his children. Ampla divitiarum Edwardi cumulo non contentus, oppressit proles. (Ibid.) I conceive that after the use of such expressions there can remain no doubt of the opinion entertained by that writer.

2. The same conviction appears to have been common to all those persons who were the most interested in ascertaining the truth. 1. The duke of Buckingham and the gentlemen of the southern counties, after the publication of the death of the princes, saw that there was no safety for themselves, unless they could raise up a new competitor for the throne, and therefore offered it to the earl of Richmond, on condition he would marry the princess Elizabeth, the next heir of the family of York. (Cont. Croyl. 568.) Can we believe that they would have acted in this manner on the credit of a meer report, the truth of which at that moment they would naturally suspect? Must they not have inquired into the matter; and have been convinced that the young Edward and his brother were dead, before they would offer the crown to an illegitimate branch of a rival family?—2. Richard, to defeat the plan, made the strongest efforts to prevail on Elizabeth, the widow of Edward, to quit the sanctuary with her daughters: but he did not succeed till he had sworn before the peers, and prelates, mayor and aldermen, that the lives of these daughters should be in no danger. Why did Elizabeth require such an oath? Undoubtedly she believed that the king had already destroyed her sons, and feared a similar fate for her daughters. Buck, p. 528.—3. Richard, even before his wife died, proposed to marry the princess Elizabeth. And the reason was, because he saw that he could not otherwise secure the throne to himself, or cut off the hopes of his rival. (Non aliter videbat regnum sibi confirmari, neque spem competitoris sui auferri posse. (Cont. Croyl. 572.) This could only be true in case that the princes were dead, and that Elizabeth was the heir to the crown.

3. Rouse, who died in 1491, openly asserts that the princes were slain, but so privately that few knew in what manner. Edwardum cum amplexibus et osculis recepit, et infra circiter duo menses vel parum ultra cum fratre suo interfecit—itā quod ex post paucissimis notum fuit qua morte martyrizati sunt. Ross, 214, 215.

4. André, the contemporary historiographer of Henry VII., says that Richard ordered the princes to be put to the sword. Ferro feriri jussit. MS. Domit. A. XVIII.

5. Sir Thomas More, who wrote soon after, in 1513, not only asserts that they were murdered, but gives the particulars of the murder from the confession of the assassins themselves. The reader has seen his account in the preceding pages.

6. In July 1674, in consequence of an order to clear the White Tower from all contiguous buildings, as the workmen were "digging down the stairs which led from the king's lodgings to the chapel in the said tower, "about ten feet in the ground, were found the bones "of two striplings in (as it seemed) a wooden chest, "which upon the survey were found proportionable to "the ages of the two brothers, viz. about 13 and 11 "years." On inquiry it was concluded that they were the bones of the murdered princes, and in consequence, after they had been sifted from the rubbish, they were honourably interred in the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster. (Sandford, 427. 429.) This has been considered as a strong confirmation of the murder; since we know of no other two boys who perished in the Tower; and are informed by More that a priest removed their bodies from the place where they had been deposited by the assassins to another spot; and that, as he died soon afterwards, his secret perished with him. (More, 68.) From the words of More it may be inferred, that ineffectual attempts had been made to discover it.

7. It furnishes a strong presumption in favour of More's narrative, that all the persons mentioned by him as concerned in the murder became objects of the king's bounty. To Greene the messenger, was given the office of receiver of the lordships of the Isle of Wight and of Porchester castle; and the numerous grants of money and lands, and lucrative offices to Tyrrell and Brackenbury may be seen in the notes by Strype to Buck's history in Kennet, i. 551, 552. Nor were the more obscure agents, the actual murderers, Dighton and Forrest, neglected by the gratitude of their patron. The first was made bailiff for life of the manor of Aiton in Staffordshire (ibid.): and, as Forrest lived but a few months in possession of the office given to him in Barnard castle, an annuity of five marks was settled on his widow and his son. (Turner, iii. 491.) This coincidence must appear very extraordinary, if we suppose More's account to be fabulous.

8. In opposition to this evidence it has been observed, that even in the days of Henry VIII. it was considered doubtful whether the princes had been murdered or not. I will therefore transcribe the words of More, whence it will appear that such doubts were not very common, nor built on any good foundation. "Whose death hath nevertheless so far come in question, that some remain yet in doubt, whether they were in his days destroyed or not. Not for that only, that Perkin Warbeck, by many folks' malice, and more folks' folly, so long space abusing the world, was, as well with princes as the poorer people, reputed and taken for the younger of these two, but for that also that all things were in late days so covertly demeaned, one thing pretended and another meant, that there was nothing so plain and openly proved, but that yet for the common custom of close and covert dealing men had it ever inwardly suspect, as many well counterfeited jewels make the true mistrusted But I shall rehearse you the dolorous end of those babes, not after every way that I have heard, but after that way I have so heard by such men and by such means as methinketh it were hard but it should be true." He then gives the account, and concludes: "Thus as I have learned of them that much knew and little cause had to lie, were these two noble princes privily slain." Pp. 67, 68.

9. It is however contended that More's narrative cannot be true. "A singular," says Laing, "and for Richard's memory, a providential concurrence of circumstances enables us to ascertain the duration, and to trace the particular stages of that progress, in the course of which the supposed destruction of his nephews was planned and accomplished. He was at

"Westminster on Sunday the 31st of August, where he "ratified the league with the king of Castile, and at "York the 7th of September, the day preceding his second coronation." (Laing, 420.) The writer then tells us that Richard was on Monday at Windsor, on Tuesday at Oxford, on Wednesday at Gloucester, on Thursday at Warwick, on Friday at Nottingham, on Saturday at Pontefract, and on Sunday at York. Now he contends that if More's account be true, Greene the messenger sent to tamper with Brakenbury, the governor of the Tower, must have left the king on his journey on the Monday or Tuesday, and have returned to Richard at Warwick on Thursday with the account of his failure, and that Tyrrel must have left Warwick on Friday, have committed the murder in the Tower on Friday night or Saturday night, and have reached the king previous to his arrival at York on Sunday: an expedition which it is impossible to believe. Hence it follows that the whole narrative is false. Laing, 420—423.

Now it must be acknowledged that, if the limits assigned to the progress of Richard by his advocates be correct, it is impossible to crowd within so short a space all the facts mentioned by More. But are those limits correct? It is certain that he was crowned with his queen at York, on Sunday the 8th of September (Drake's Eborac. 117, Rouse, 217), after having created his son prince of Wales, in a full assembly of the nobility, the same day. (Rym. xii. 200.) Hence he must have arrived at York the day before, and if he left London only on the first, must have performed his long and circuitous journey in seven days. But is it then certain that he was at Westminster on the 31st of August? for on the accuracy of that date depends all the reasoning of the king's advocates. The only proof of it is, that two instruments are to be found in Rymer, dated August 31, teste rege apud Westmonasterium. (Rym. xii. 198, 199.) But such instruments prove nothing more than that the chapellor was at Westminster. The king might have been at the distance of 300 miles. They were said to be issued teste rege, because they were issued from his high court of chancery. Thus we know that at the death of Edward IV. on the 9th of April 1483, his son Edward V.

was at Ludlow, and did not reach London before the 4th of May following. And yet on the 23d of April, eleven days before he came near Westminster, thirty-three writs were published in his name, dated at Westminster teste rege. (Rym. xii. 79*.) Hence it is evident that the writs in question, on which Carte, Walpole, and Laing, rest their principal argument, prove nothing as to the presence or absence of Richard on the day on which they are dated.

It is, however, easy to show that he was on that day in the neighbourhood of York, and that his progress instead of six days occupied a whole month. The ancient writers mention that he set out shortly after his coronation on the 6th of July. (Cont. Croyl. 567. Fab. 516.) He went from London to Windsor; from Windsor to Oxford. The day of his arrival is not specified: but he received from the university a petition in favour of the bishop of Ely, dated the 4th of August (apud Speed, p. 932), whence it is not improbable that he was there at that time. His next stage was Woodstock, where the people of the country complained to him that his brother had unjustly annexed a large tract of land to the forest of Wichwood; and on inquiry he granted to them a charter of disafforestation. Thence he proceeded to Gloucester; and to honour a city from which he took his title of duke, he appointed there a mayor and sheriffs. The two next stages were Worcester and Warwick. Here he was joined by the queen and the Spanish ambassadors, who came direct from Windsor, and kept his court for a whole week †, having with him five bishops, the duke of Albany, four earls, five barons, the chief justice of the king's bench, and other lords and knights, and a great number of noble ladies attending on the queen. He next proceeded to Coventry, then to Leicester, and from Leicester to Nottingham, where he was on the 23d of August. For we have a letter written there on that day by his

* In former editions I referred to another instance from the reign of Richard II. But Mr. Duffus Hardy (Introduc. to Close Rolls, xv.) has shown that Rymer, on whose authority I relied, had mistaken the real date.

† Of this circumstance, so important in the present inquiry, Rouse could not be ignorant, as he lived at the same time at Guy's cliff, only four miles from Warwick.

private secretary, announcing to the citizens of York his approach to their city, and telling them that "the king's lords and judges were with him, sitting and determining the complaints of poor folks, with due punishment of offenders against his laws." (Drake, 116.) He afterwards stopped at Pontefract, where he appointed a mayor, and thence proceeded to York. (See this progress in Rouse, 216, 217.) From York, on the 31st of August, he despatched an order to Piers Courties, keeper of the wardrobe, to send to that city his spurs, banners, coats of arms, &c. which might be wanted against his coronation. (Drake's Eborac. 119. Buck, 527.) It is evident, then, that instead of leaving London on Sept. 1st, to be crowned in York Sept. 8th, he was the whole month of August on his journey, and reached York before the day on which he has been supposed to be still in London.—It may also be observed that this account agrees with that of More. He despatched Greene when he was on his way to Gloucester, and received Greene's report on his arrival at Warwick. Thence he sent Tyrrel to the Tower, and the murder was committed soon after, probably during the week that he remained at Warwick, which, from the date of his residence at Nottingham, must have been about the middle of August; the time assigned by Rouse, who says, the young king was murdered something more than three months after he had been received and caressed by his uncle, which was on the last day of April. (Rouse, 215.)

10. Walpole (pp. 70, 71) transcribes a passage from the roll of parliament of 1484, to prove that Edward V. was alive when that parliament was sitting, and consequently could not have been put to death during Richard's progress to York. But if he had paid more attention to the roll, he would have found that he was copying from the petition presented to the protector at Baynard's castle, and that the passage in question proved only that Edward was alive at the time when his uncle usurped the throne. See Rot. Parl. vi. 241.

11. Mr. Bailey, in his history of the Tower (p. 343), notices certain warrants for the delivery of clothing, and the payment of provisions for the use of "the lord Bastard, given under our signet at Westminster the ix

"day of March, anno secundo:" whence he infers that one of the royal brothers, under the name of the lord bastard, was living a year and a half after the time of their supposed death. But there can be no doubt that the lord bastard, mentioned in the warrants, was Richard's own son, John of Gloucester, whom he made two days later governor of Calais for life, reserving to himself the exercise of the office till the boy should come of age. Rym. xii. 265.

12. The last argument I shall mention is taken from Bacon's History of Henry VII., p. 71. He tells us, that soon after the appearance of Perkin, Tyrrel and Dighton (Forrest, the other murderer, was dead) were committed to the Tower, and, as the king gave out, both agreed in the same tale: that nevertheless Henry made no use of their confessions: that Tyrrel was soon afterwards beheaded for other matters of treason, but Dighton, who it seems spake best for the king, was set at liberty, and was the principal means of divulging this tradition. Now, if it were true that Henry examined these persons at the time of Perkin's appearance, and yet did not use their evidence to prove that he was not the duke of York, the omission would certainly justify a suspicion that they did not acknowledge the murder. The real fact is, that they were examined only a short time before the execution of Tyrrel, as Bacon himself says; but that execution did not take place, as he supposes, soon after the appearance of Perkin, but at the distance of ten years, in 1502, for having favoured the escape of the earl of Suffolk. (Rot. Parl. vi. 545.) Of course Henry could not employ their confession in any of his declarations against Perkin, which were published long before. This is also plain from sir Thomas More's history, who wrote a few years afterwards. "Very truth it is, and well known, that at such time as sir James Tyrrel was in the Tower for treason committed against king Henry VII., both Dighton and he were examined, and confessed the murder in manner above written." More, 68.

THE pretensions of Warbeck offer a problem which has been thought of difficult solution. Was he an impostor, or was he the real duke of York? Our ancient historians have unanimously adopted the former opinion: but their authority has been set aside by some modern writers, who contend that under the dynasty of the Tudors no man would venture to express even a doubt injurious to the cause of the reigning family. If credit be due to Carte, and Walpole, and Laing, Warbeck was the real son of Edward IV., and the rightful heir to the throne.

The arguments most favourable to the claim of this adventurer are drawn from two sources, its admission by foreign princes, and the inability of Henry to discover his real origin as an impostor. 1. He was acknowledged as duke of York by Charles of France, by James of Scotland, and by Margaret of Burgundy. If it be said that the object of Charles was to distress Henry, James at least ought to have been convinced of the real character of Warbeck before he would give to him his kinswoman in marriage; and the conduct of Margaret, who was less liable to be deceived, must prove that he was really her nephew, or that she knowingly promoted an imposture. But in the latter supposition what could be her object? Her niece was queen of England; the children of that niece were presumptive heirs to the crown. Would she attempt to disinherit her own family, in favour of an obscure and unknown adventurer?

2. Henry with all his arts and intrigues could never form a plausible account of the origin and adventures of Warbeck. The stories circulated with his connivance bear evident marks of uncertainty and falsehood. There were two methods by which he might have successfully detected the imposture. He might have ascertained the death of the princes in the Tower by the apprehension and examination of the reputed assassins; or after the surrender of Warbeck, he might have confronted him with his own queen and her sisters. Their testimony would have decided the question. If then he adopted neither of these measures, it is an argument that he dared not. He must have known that both of the brothers were not put to death by their uncle, and that the younger had escaped, and now claimed the crown. Such are, in short, the arguments of those, who maintain the cause of the adventurer.

To me, however, the arguments against the identity of Warbeck with Richard duke of York, appear greatly to preponderate. 1. From the preceding pages it has been seen that the death of the two princes was believed by all those who were most interested to know the truth, by their mother Elizabeth and their uncle Richard, by the partisans of the house of Lancaster, and those of the house of York, and even by Henry himself, as late at least as the summer of 1487, when he offered to marry their mother to the king of Scots, and their two sisters to his two sons. Four years later a young man appears in Ireland, and professes to be the younger of the two princes, who were believed to be dead. Was it not incumbent on him to prove his pretensions, to show how he had escaped from the murderers, to what place he had been conveyed, and where and how he had spent the eight years which had elapsed since his supposed death? Yet all this was kept a profound secret. Even in his proclamation at the head of the Scottish army, when it was so much for his interest that the English should be convinced of his claim, he contents himself with asserting, "that in his tender age he had escaped by God's great might out of the Tower of London, had been secretly conveyed over sea to other divers countries, and had remained there certain years as unknown." Does not this meagre account, in circumstances when the clearest proofs were required, betray a secret consciousness that his history would not bear investigation?

2. His assertions seem to have been generally disbelieved by the nation. The persons who adhered to him in France were most, if not all, of them outlaws; and the gentlemen who were attainted on his account in England seem to have suffered, not so much for having admitted his pretensions, as for their attempts to ascertain who he was, which Henry ascribed to a treasonable disaffection towards himself. After that period no person of note attached himself to the pretender. When he landed on the coast of Kent, he was immediately repulsed; when he entered England successively at the head of a Scottish army, and was in a condition to protect his friends, not an individual repaired to his standard; and when he afterwards assumed the command of the Cornish insurgents, he did not debauch a single gentleman from his allegiance to Henry. It is not credible that the numerous partisans of the house of York would have remained quiet on all these occasions, unless they had reason to believe him an impostor.

3. This is strongly corroborated by the conduct of Henry. Would his jealousy have spared the real duke of York, when he had him once in his power? Would he have exhibited him to the gaze of the populace on the road, or of the citizens in London, of whom many could have recognised his features? Would he have suffered him to roam at liberty through the palace at Westminster for six months, exposed to the daily view of the queen, her sisters, and the principal nobility? After his flight and recapture, would not the king have gladly employed that plausible pretext to free himself from so dangerous a competitor? Whoever compares his conduct to the earl of Warwick with his conduct to Warbeck, will be convinced that as he knew the former to be a real Plantagenet, so he believed the latter to be no other than an impostor.

4. But how are we to account for the acknowledgment of his claim by foreign powers? It may be observed that, if the union of the two roses by the marriage of Henry and Elizabeth had satisfied many of the Yorkists, there still existed a party, which through enmity to the house of Lancaster, sought to raise to the throne the young earl of Warwick. At its head was the duchess of Burgundy. She first patronised the imposture of Simnel, afterwards that of Warbeck. If either had succeeded, there would have been little difficulty in removing the phantom to make place for the reality. The conduct of Charles VIII. proves nothing more than his wish to distress and intimidate Henry. He had previously attempted to raise the friends of Warwick; when that failed, Warbeck, probably at his instigation, solicited the aid of the Yorkists in Ireland; and on their refusal, was invited to the French court as heir to the English crown. But the event proved that this invitation had no other object than to induce Henry to sign the treaty. From the moment that was accomplished, Perkin received no countenance from the king of France. With respect to the king of Scotland, there seems to have been much also of policy in the reception which he gave to the adventurer. It was argued that if Perkin were successful, he could refuse nothing to the prince who had placed him on the throne; that if he were not, Henry would still make advantageous offers to James to detach him from the cause of his rival. On this account, says Polydore, the king, whether it were through error and pity, or only through dissimulation, began to show him great honour, &c. p. 590.

The consideration of these circumstances has left no doubt on my mind that Warbeck was an impostor. He was probably brought forward to screen the young earl of Warwick from the jealousy of Henry. If he fell in the attempt, Warwick was still safe; if he succeeded, the disclosure of the secret would raise that young prince to the throne. This at least is certain, that as long as Warwick lived, pretenders to the crown rapidly succeeded each other; after his execution, Henry was permitted to reign without molestation.
